"It has been asked why, in these solemn warnings against a false asceticism, which S. Paul foresaw might and would be substituted for a really earnest, God-fearing life, the question of celibacy was dismissed with one short sentence, while the apparently less-important question of abstaining from particular kinds of food was discussed with some detail. The reason is easily discoverable. The counsel to abstain from marriage was a strange and unnatural suggestion, one contrary to the plain scheme of creation. Any teaching which taught that the celibate's life was a life peculiarly pleasing to God would, at the same time, throw a slur upon all home and family life, and the apostle felt that men's ordinary common sense would soon relegate any such strange teaching to obscurity; but with the question of abstaining from meats—that was connected with the precepts of the Mosaic Law, which dealt at some length (probably from reasons connected with the public health) with these restrictions in the matter of meats—S. Paul taught that all food was from the hand of one Maker—nothing, then, could really be considered common or unclean without throwing a slur upon the All-Creator. Which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving. God's primeval intention is thus sharply contrasted with men's arbitrary restrictions. This Divine intention is repeated with still greater emphasis in ver. 4"—C. B.

5. It is sanctified by the word of God—"creating all, and giving it to man for food—and by prayer. The children of God are to pray for the sanctification of all the creatures which they use. And not only the Christians, but, even the Jews, yea the very heathens, used to consecrate their table by prayer"—WESLEY.

"The sanctification referred to by S. Paul belongs to no one prayer or grace, but to the constant habit of referring everything to God as the giver of all—to the perpetual 'office' of a devout heart, which, taking everything as a gift from God, the lover and the friend of man, thanks God from the heart continually"—ELLICOTT.

7. "Like those who were to contend in the Grecian games, exercise thyself unto godliness—train thyself up in holiness of heart and life, with the utmost labour, vigour, and diligence"—WESLEY.

"Mind practical religion. Those that would be godly must exercise themselves unto godliness; it requires a constant exercise. The reason is taken from the gain of godliness. Bodily exercise profiteth little, or 'for a little time.' What will it avail us to mortify the body, if we do not mortify sin?"—M. HENRY.

8. Bodily exercise profiteth a little—"increases the health and strength of the body"—WESLEY.

For the training of the body, on which so much importance was laid by the Greeks, is profitable for little: it has its uses, but they are comparatively unimportant. (Comp. 1 Cor. 9. 24–27.) Some refer the words to the ascetic practices just condemned; but the apostle, in such a context, when his object was to warn against them, would hardly speak of them as profitable, even for little: while allusions to gymnastic training would be appropriate and significant in writing to Timothy, whose father was a Greek. Godliness is profitable for all things—"it is the most practical of all things. It lays hold on man's whole nature. It purifies his body; it illumines and sanctifies his intellect; it braces his will. It penetrates into every department of his life, whether business or amusement, social intercourse, or private meditation"—PLUMMER. Promise of the life that now is. Perhaps "the promise of life," i.e. of all that life can give and is. But the best promises even of the present life are spiritual.

9. A faithful saying. Here referring to the foregoing maxim (see on ch. 1. 15). There is nothing in what follows which has any appearance of a well-known phrase.

10. Therefore—"animated by this promise—we both labour and suffer reproach—we regard neither pleasure, ease, nor honour—because we trust—for this very thing the world will hate us—in the living God—who will give us the life He has promised—who is the Saviour of all men—preserving them in this life, and willing to save them eternally. But especially—in a more eminent manner—of them that believe—and so are saved everlastingly"—WESLEY.

"Who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe. These words, like the assertion of ch. 2. 4, have been often pressed into the service of that school of kindly, but mistaken, interpreters, who ignore, or explain away, the plain doctrine of Holy Scripture which tells us there are those whose destruction from the presence of the Lord shall be everlasting, whose portion shall be the 'second death' (2 Thess. 1. 9; Rev. 21. 8). These interpreters prefer to substitute in place of this terrible, but repeated declaration, their own perilous theories of universalism. Here the gracious words seem to affix a seal to the statement immediately preceding, which speaks of 'the hope in the living God' as the source of all the labour and brave patience of the Lord's true servants. The living God is also a loving God, the Saviour of all, if they would receive Him, and, undoubtedly, the Redeemer of those who accept His love and are faithful to His holy cause"—SPENCE.

12. "Let no one have reason to despise thee for thy youth. To prevent this, Be a pattern in word—public and private. In spirit—in your whole temper. In faith. When this is placed in the midst of several other Christian graces, it generally means a particular branch of it; fidelity or faithfulness"—WESLEY.

"Timothy was probably at this time thirty-eight or forty, and therefore much younger than some of the presbyters or elders he had to govern. His youth had probably been before objected to him (see 1 Cor. 16. 11). An example—in word—both in public teaching and private converse. Conversation—rather, 'conduct,' the sense indeed in which the word conversation was used by our translators. (Comp. 2 Cor. 1. 12; Gal. 1. 13; Eph. 1. 3; 4. 22)"—S. C. TRAPP says: "Reason indeed should rule; but when reason cannot prevail, example will." "In word—this refers to the public utterances, in teaching and exhortation, but more particularly to the words used by Timothy in social intercourse. These, in such a life as that of the young presiding elder of the Ephesian church, must have been of the deepest importance. The tone of his conversation was no doubt imitated by many, it would influence for good or evil the whole Christian society of that great centre. The words of men placed in such a position should ever be true and generous, helpful and encouraging, and, above all, free from slander, from all low and pitiful conceptions of others. In purity—chastity of mind as well as body is here signified. Every Christian must be watchful, lest he should seem to set a careless example in the matter of morality"—ELLICOTT.

13. Give thyself to reading—"both publicly and privately. Enthusiasts, observe this! Expect no end without the means"—WESLEY.

"Till I come give attendance to reading. The words evidently imply a hope, perhaps even an expectation, on the part of S. Paul, that he would one day be enabled once more to visit the church of Ephesus; but so long as that absence lasted, Timothy was to attend carefully to three special points in the public ministry in which he was, in the apostle's absence, the chief officer. The reading was that public reading of Scripture in the congregation—a practice borrowed from the synagogue service, when publicly the Law and the Prophets were read to the people assembled. To exhortation, to doctrine. These both most probably refer to the public ministry in the congregation. The first, exhortation, particularly applies to the feelings. The reading of the Scriptures must be followed by an earnest practical application of their teaching to the affairs of that life in the midst of which the Christian listener was living. The word doctrine suggests a public teaching, directed rather to the understanding of the hearers. The idea of exposition, or even of dogmatic teaching, seems here included"—C. B.

14. Neglect not—"they neglect it who do not exercise it to the full"—WESLEY.

"Which was given thee by prophecy—by immediate direction from God—by the laying on of my hands (2 Tim. 1. 6); while the elders joined also in the solemnity. This presbytery probably consisted of some others, together with Paul and Silas"—WESLEY.

"The very titles of the old covenant dispensation seem to have been revived in this instance of the Divine selection of Timothy; for in ch. 6. 11 the older apostle addresses his representative at Ephesus with the old prophetic title when he writes, 'Thou, O man of God, flee these things.' Now he solemnly calls attention to that strange, miraculous 'grace' which some inspired prophet at his ordination declared was to be conferred on Timothy. The 'gift' was said to be conferred, as to its certainty in the Divine counsels, by such prophecy—the Holy Spirit, by the mouth of one or more of His prophets, declaring His will and intention to confer this special grace on the young companion of S. Paul"—ELLICOTT.

15. Meditate. "The Bible makes no distinction between this and to contemplate, whatever others do. True meditation is no other than faith, hope, love, joy, melted down together, as it were, by the fire of God's Holy Spirit; and offered up to God in secret. He that is wholly in these will be little in worldly company, in other studies, in collecting books, medals, or butterflies, wherein many pastors drone away so considerable a part of their lives"—WESLEY.

"Give thyself wholly to them—lit. 'be in them'; make them your life's employment. With these words S. Paul closes this division of his solemn directions to his chosen disciple and representative at Ephesus. He must dwell on these things and must be diligent in their practice; he must show himself active and industrious as a public teacher, and must also order his life so as to be an example to his fellow-believers. To his public teaching and his public example, he must give ceaseless attention, that the Christian brotherhood of the church over which he presided should be enabled constantly to see what progress their chief pastor was making in Christian experience and life"—ELLICOTT.

16. Continue in them—"in all the preceding advices"—WESLEY.

The minister of Christ must be equally careful of his character and his teaching. Some day he must account for both. If both be right there will be a double reward: in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee.

CHAPTER V.

MISCELLANEOUS DIRECTIONS FOR DISCIPLINE AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.—1, 2. Rebuke not—"considering your own youth, with such a severity as would otherwise be proper"—WESLEY.

"Let his relations with his younger members of the family of Christ be rather those of a brother and a friend than of a superior in rank and dignity. The elder women as mothers. The same watchful care against all assumption of superiority must also be exercised in his dealings with the Christian matrons of Ephesus. The younger as sisters, with all purity. In the case of the younger women, S. Paul adds to his directions respecting brotherly and sisterly regard a grave word, urging upon Timothy, and all official teachers like Timothy, to add to this self-denying, loving friendship a ceaseless watchfulness in all their conversation, so as not to afford any ground for suspicion; for, above all things, the recognised teacher of Christianity must be pure"—C. B.

3. Honour—"that is, maintain out of the public stock"—WESLEY.

"The provision of the widow was attributable to the exertions of the church, which never relaxed its solicitude for the interest of wives surviving their husbands—winning, perhaps, one of the most arduous of its triumphs when, after exacting for two or three centuries an express promise from the husband at marriage to endow his wife, it at length succeeded in engrafting the principle of dower on the customary law of all Western Europe"—MAINE.

4. Let these learn to requite their parents—"for all their former care, trouble, and expense"—WESLEY.

Here a warning against allowing the church to be burdened with a burden which others ought to bear is given, in the form of a pressing reminder to the children or grandchildren of the destitute and desolate widow. It is a solemn and imperative duty for the children to afford all needful succour—a duty not to be evaded by any bearing the Christian name.

5. Widows indeed—"who have no near relations to provide for them; and who are wholly devoted to God. Desolate—having neither children nor grandchildren to relieve her"—WESLEY.

"The chief pastor in Ephesus must remember that among the women of his flock there were some widows indeed, with neither children nor grandchildren to assist them, without friends even to cheer their desolate life. To find out and to succour these poor, sad-hearted, friendless beings, S. Paul reminds Timothy, was one of the duties of a Christian minister"—ELLICOTT.

6. She that liveth in pleasure—"delicately, voluptuously, in elegant, regular sensuality, though not in the use of any such pleasures as are unlawful in themselves"—WESLEY.

In pleasure—"and extravagantly: the Greek word combines the notion of luxurious self-indulgence with that of prodigality"—TRENCH. Such a life destroys the spiritual life.

7. That they—"that is, the widows"—WESLEY.

That they may be blameless. "That, whether seeking support from the public alms of the Christian community or not, the widows of the congregation should struggle after an irreproachable, self-denying life, and show before men publicly whose servants they indeed were. In these words there seems a hint that the former life of many of these women-converts to Christianity had been very different to the life loved of Christ, and that in their new profession as Christians there was urgent need of watchfulness on their part not to give any occasion to slanderous tongues"—SPENCE.

8. If any provide not—"food and raiment—for his own—mother and grandmother, being desolate widows—he hath—virtually—denied the faith—which does not destroy but perfect natural duties. What has this to do with heaping up money for our children, for which it is often so impertinently alleged? But all men have their reasons for laying up money. One will go to hell for fear of want; another acts like a heathen, lest he should be worse than an infidel"—WESLEY.

"The apostle here reverts to the obligation of children and grandchildren, which indeed has a wider application,—if any one—not merely those within these closer relationships—does not provide for his own relatives, and especially those of his own household—his own immediate family—he has denied the faith—practically, and is, in this respect, worse than an unbeliever, who does, for the most part, perform these natural duties of domestic life"—S. C.

9. Let not a widow be chosen—"into the number of deaconesses, who attended sick women or travelling preachers—under threescore—afterwards they were admitted at forty, if they were eminent for holiness. Having been the wife of one husband—that is, having lived in lawful marriage, whether with one or more persons successively"—WESLEY.

"Although the highest work for Christ can best be done by those who by remaining single have kept their domestic ties at a minimum, yet young women are more likely to do useful work in society, and are less likely to come to harm, if they marry and have children. Of older women this is not true. Age itself is a considerable guarantee; and a woman of sixty, who is willing to give such a pledge, may be encouraged to enter upon a life of perpetual widowhood. But there must be other qualifications as well, if she wishes to be enrolled among those who not only are entitled by their destitute condition to receive maintenance from the Church, but by reason of their fitness are commissioned to undertake Church work. And these qualifications must be carefully investigated"—PLUMMER.

10. If she hath washed the feet of the saints—"has been ready to do the meanest offices for them"—WESLEY.

"If—for example—she have brought up children—those of others, especially orphans, besides her own; washed the saints' feet—paid the kind offices of hospitality in an especial manner to Christians, as distinguished from 'strangers'"—S. C. If she have diligently followed every good work. This sums up the beautiful character to be sought for in the candidates for membership in this chosen women's band. She must be known not merely as a mother and a wife, who had well and faithfully performed the womanly duties of her home life, but men must speak of her as one who had diligently and lovingly sought out the rough places of the world, and who, with a brave and patient self-denial, with a sweet and touching self-forgetfulness, had set herself to perform those kind, good actions the Master loves so well.

11. "Refuse—do not choose. For when they are waxed wanton against Christ—to whose more immediate service they had addicted themselves—they want to marry—and not with a single eye to the glory of God; and so withdraw themselves from that entire service of the Church to which they were before engaged"—WESLEY.

"The younger women must be held ineligible for the presbyterial order. S. Paul, writing under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, saw how often the renunciation of old pursuits and pleasures, made under peculiar pressure of circumstances, undertaken in the hot fervour of youth, in later days would become weary and distasteful"—ELLICOTT.

12. They have rejected their first faith—"have deserted their trust in God, and have acted contrary to the first conviction, namely, that wholly to devote themselves to His service was the most excellent way. When we first receive power to believe, does not the Spirit of God generally point out what are the most excellent things; and at the same time, give us a holy resolution to walk in the highest degree of Christian severity? And how unwise are we ever to sink into anything below it"—WESLEY.

Having damnation—"incurring condemnation. Their first faith—or 'promise'; the engagement they made, if not formally, at least virtually, when they were admitted on the roll of widows, one of whose qualifications was, to have been the wife of one husband"—S. C. "Such a going back, such a giving up the higher and the more devoted life—the life of self-sacrifice, of self-abnegation—for the ordinary joys and cares of domestic life, for the useful but still everyday pursuits of ordinary men and women;—such a going back would be indeed a casting off their first faith, and such an example of backsliding could not fail to harm the cause of Christ"—ELLICOTT.

13. "From house to house—lit. 'the houses' which it was their business to visit. As the duties of the ecclesiastical widows required them to visit the families of believers, it was necessary that they should be discreet, experienced, and godly women, to prevent their visits from degenerating into idle gossip and talebearing"—S. C. "Idleness is an art soon learned. Doing nothing may quickly become doing naughtily"—TRAPP. Busybodies. (See Prov. 20. 3.)

14. I counsel therefore the younger women—"widows or virgins, such as are not disposed to live single—to marry, to bear children, to guide the family—then will they have sufficient employment of their own—and give no occasion of reproach to the adversary—whether Jew or heathen"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's practical mind, guided by the Spirit of God, has left us no impossible rules of perfection, no exaggerated praises of asceticism, of lofty self-denial, no passionate exhortings to a life made up entirely of self-sacrifice and self-surrender. He knew the ordinary man or woman was incapable of such exalted heroism, and therefore was too wise, too loving, even to recommend a life which few could live. It was not that the Master, Christ, and the greatest of His servants, S. Paul, did not themselves prize and admire the higher ideal and the nobler life—for was it not their own? Did not one attain to it, and the other die in his hero-efforts to reach it? But Master and scholar in their gospel of the world have left commands that all, not the few, can obey—have enjoined a life which all, not the few, may live"—SPENCE.

15. Some—"widows—have turned aside after Satan—who has drawn them from Christ"—WESLEY.

"Turned away after Satan—from sobriety and purity, and consequently, perhaps, from the faith. There was abundant time for the apostle to have had experience of such melancholy declensions at Ephesus, or at any rate in other churches; so that it is a feeble argument which infers from these words a date in the second century for this Epistle"—S. C.

17. Let the elders that rule well—"who approve themselves faithful stewards of all that is committed to their charge—be counted worthy of double honour—a more abundant provision, seeing that such will employ it all to the glory of God. As it was the most laborious and disinterested men who were put into these offices, so whatever anyone had to bestow, in his life or death, was generally lodged in their hands for the poor. By this means the churchmen became very rich in after ages; but as the design of the donors was something else, there is the highest reason why it should be disposed of according to their pious intent. Especially those — of them — who labour—diligently and painfully—in the word and teaching — in teaching the word" — WESLEY.

"The consideration of the position and qualifications of certain ruling elder women, 'the presbyterial widows,' reminded S. Paul of certain points to be impressed on Timothy connected with the rank and honour due to the more distinguished presbyters associated with him in the Ephesian congregations"—ELLICOTT.

18. "The ox that treadeth out the corn—rather and more literally, 'an ox while threshing.' The precept in Deut. 25. 4 is one of humanity to animals. The ox, while treading out the corn with his hoofs, or dragging the threshing-wain over it, was not to be prevented from helping himself as the reward of his labour. S. Paul, in an earlier Epistle (1 Cor. 9. 9), had argued from this text the right of a minister to be maintained by those to whom he ministers; he here refers to it as inferring the right. And the labourer is worthy of his reward — rather, 'hire,' as in Luke 10. 7, where these words are used by our Lord. It is highly probable that S. Paul was acquainted with the Gospel of S. Luke, which was written before the Acts of the Apostles. In all probability the words the Scripture saith refer only to the first quotation; and even if the latter clause is included, our Lord's words recorded by S. Luke may have been called Scripture by S. Paul, as S. Paul's own Epistles are by S. Peter (2 Pet. 3. 16)"—S. C.

19. Against an elder—"or presbyter—do not even receive an accusation unless by two or three witnesses. By the Mosaic Law, a private person might be cited (though not condemned) on the testimony of one witness; but S. Paul forbids an elder to be even cited on such evidence, his reputation being of more importance than that of others"—WESLEY.

"Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses. By the 'elder' here we must understand a presbyter—the ordained minister of the Church. S. Paul has been directing his son in the faith, and successor in the government of the chief Asian church, carefully to watch for, and to reward by dignity and honour, the services of the more zealous and distinguished presbyters. He now tells him that the other matters, besides zeal and successful service among the Church's professed officers, will come before him when he stands at the helm of the Church. Charges—owing, possibly, to jealousy, party feeling, suspected doctrinal error — will not unfrequently be brought against a presbyter. Such an accusation is only to be received by Timothy when the evidence is perfectly clear. Every possible precaution against simply vexatious charges brought against one occupying the hard and difficult position of a presbyter, must be taken by the presiding minister. The reference is to Deut. 17. 6"—SPENCE.

20. Those — "elders—that sin — scandalously, and are duly convicted—rebuke before all—the Church"—WESLEY.

S. Paul here passes to the question how to deal with the responsible officers of the Church when they were proved to be notoriously sinning. While, on the one hand, the earnest and devoted men were to be honoured with "a double honour,"—while every possible legal precaution was to be taken in the case of those being accused—on the other hand, when proved to be men continuing in sin and error, their punishment must be as marked as in the other case was the reward.

21. I charge thee before God —"referring to the last judgment, in which we shall stand before God and Christ, with His elect, that is holy, angels, who are the witnesses of our conversation. The apostle looks through his own labours, and even through time itself, and seems to stand as one already in eternity. That thou observe these things without prejudging—passing no sentence till the cause is fully heard—or partiality—for or against anyone"—WESLEY.

"The elect angels. The words are variously explained. It is perhaps best to understand them (1) generally, the holy angels, God's special attendants. So 'elect' is used in 1 Pet. 2. 6, not so much to imply distinction as to express excellence. The elect saints are God's Church on earth: the elect angels are in His court in heaven. Other interpretations are (2) those who kept their first estate, in contradistinction to the fallen angels; (3) the guardian angels of Timothy or of the church of Ephesus; (4) angels specially selected by God as His messengers to men"—S. C. "Without prejudice—every man should be dealt with in the Church as he will be dealt with at the judgment-seat of Christ"—CLARKE.

22. Lay hands suddenly on no man—"that is, appoint no man to Church offices without full trial and examination; else thou wilt be accessory to, and accountable for, his misbehaviour in his office. Keep thyself pure—from the blood of all men"—WESLEY.

Keep thyself pure—with a strong emphasis on the pronoun—"strictness in inquiring into the antecedents of candidates for ordination and in dealing with ministerial depravity will have a very poor effect, unless your own life is free from reproach." And, if we omit the parenthetical advice about taking wine, the thought is continued thus: "As a rule it is not difficult to arrive at a wise decision respecting the fitness of candidates, or the guilt of accused presbyters. The vices of the wicked and the virtues of the good outrun any formal judgment about them (see ver. 24). Sooner or later, men, and especially ministers, will be known for what they are"—PLUMMER. "It will be most correct to take the exhortation quite generally, so that the meaning is, Timothy is to lay hands in over-hasty fashion on no one—whatever the occasion may be. He who thoughtlessly lays hands on the unworthy, thereby declaring them worthy of the Divine blessing, makes himself a sharer in their sins. Against this Timothy is to guard"—MEYER.

23. "Drink no longer water—rather, 'Be no longer a water-drinker,' which Timothy had, perhaps, become, either in compliance with the best features of an ascetic tendency now developing, or as an example to the luxurious Greeks" —S. C.

24. Some men's sins are manifest beforehand—"before any strict inquiry be made—going before to judgment—so that you may immediately judge them unworthy of any spiritual office—and some they—their sins—follow after—more covertly"—WESLEY.

In appointing men to sacred offices in the Church, among the candidates Timothy would find (1) some of whom he knew nothing, but only that they professed Christianity—let such be tried before they are appointed; (2) some of whose faith and piety he had the fullest knowledge, and whose usefulness in the Church was well known; (3) some whose lives were not at all or but partially reformed, who were still unchanged in their hearts, and unholy in their lives. The sins of these latter were known to all; they go before to judgment—with them he could have no difficulty. On all these accounts the exhortation is necessary, Lay hands suddenly on no man. Judgment. "Some explain 'judgment' of the judgment of God, when the secrets of all hearts will be disclosed; a sense in which the words are awfully true. But the thought is alien from the context, which consists of practical directions to Timothy"—S. C.

25. They that are otherwise—"not so manifest—cannot be long hid—from thy knowledge. On this account, also, be not hasty in laying on of hands"—WESLEY.

Likewise, etc. "In like manner, too, their good words are manifest, and they that are otherwise—not manifest at first sight—cannot be hid on inquiry. The caution is directed against prejudice (ver. 21) and haste (ver. 22)" —S. C. "In his difficult post Timothy might fear lest, especially in his selection of men for the Lord's service, true nobility of character might not unfrequently escape his notice and be overlooked, and that thus the best and truest might never be enrolled on the register of church officers. S. Paul bids him take courage in the thought that in many a case self-sacrifice, generosity, stern principle, will be sufficiently manifest to guide him in his choice of fit persons for the holy calling; and in those rarer cases where the higher and sweeter virtues are hidden, he may be sure that in God's good season these too will become known to him, in ample time for him to call them also into his Master's service"—C. B.

CHAPTER VI.

1. Let servants under the yoke—"of heathen masters—account them worthy of all honour—all the honour due from a servant to a master—lest the name of God and His doctrine be blasphemed—as it surely will, if they do otherwise"—WESLEY.

"There are four passages in which S. Paul deals directly with the relations between slaves and their masters—in Eph. 6. 5–9; Col. 3. 22; ch. 4. 1; Phil. 8. 21, and here. Here he looks at the question from the slave's point of view; in the letter to Philemon from that of the master; in the Epistles to the Colossians and to the Ephesians he addresses both. Without attacking the rights of property or existing laws and customs, he spoke a far higher word, and one which sooner or later must carry freedom with it, when he said, 'You must love your slaves.' The apostle's injunctions to slaves who have Christian masters is worthy of special attention; it indicates one of the evils which would certainly have become serious, had the apostles set to work to preach emancipation. The slaves being in almost all cases quite unfit for a life of freedom, wholesale emancipation would have flooded society with crowds of persons quite unable to make a decent use of their newly-acquired liberty. S. Paul tells the slave, 'While you are under the yoke prove yourselves worthy of it and capable of bearing it. In becoming Christians you have become Christ's freemen. Show that you can enjoy that liberty without abusing it. If it leads you to treat a heathen master with disdain, because he has it not, then you give him an opportunity of blaspheming God and your holy religion; for he can say, 'What a vile creed this must be, which makes servants haughty and disrespectful. If it leads you to treat a Christian master with contemptuous familiarity, because he recognises you as a brother whom he must love, then you are turning upside down the obligation which a common faith imposes on you. That he is a fellow-Christian is a reason why you should treat him with more reverence, not less.' This is ever the burden of his exhortation to slaves. (See verse following and Tit. 2. 9, 10)"—PLUMMER.

2. Let them not despise them—"pay them the less honour or obedience. Because they are brethren—and in that respect on a level with them. They that live in a religious community know the danger of this; and that greater grace is requisite to bear with the faults of a brother than of an infidel, or man of the world. But rather do them service—serve them so much the more diligently—because they are joint partakers of the great benefit —salvation. These things—Paul, the aged, gives young Timotheus a charge to dwell upon practical holiness. Less experienced teachers are apt to neglect the superstructure, whilst they lay the foundation; but of so great importance did S. Paul see it to enforce obedience to Christ, as well as to preach faith in His blood, that, after strongly urging the life of faith on professors, he even adds another charge for the strict observance of it"—WESLEY.

PLUMMER adds: "We have social difficulties to deal with, whose magnitude and character make them not unlike that of slavery in the first ages of Christianity. There are the relations between capital and labour, the prodigious inequalities in the distribution of wealth. In attempting to remedy such things, let us, while we catch enthusiasm from S. Paul's sympathetic zeal, not forget his patience and discretion. Monstrous evils are not to be slain at a blow. They are deeply rooted; and if we attempt to tear them up, we may pull up the foundations of society along with them. Charity, we know, never faileth; but neither Scripture nor experience has taught us that violence is a sure road to success. We need more faith in the principles of Christianity and in their power to promote happiness as well as godliness. To serve others, to spend and be spent for them, that is the ideal to place before mankind; and just in proportion as it is reached, will the frightful inequalities between class and class, and between man and man, cease to be." "The danger which naturally attended the conversion of slaves to Christianity, that, feeling themselves thus called in the highest sense to an equality with their masters, they might neglect the duties of their station, or at least repine against it, is provided against in various passages of S. Paul's Epistles (1 Cor. 7. 21-24; Eph. 6. 5-8; Col. 3. 22-24; Tit. 2. 9, 10)"—S. C.

3. If any teach otherwise—"than strict practical holiness in all its branches. And consent not to sound words—lit. 'healthful words'; words that have no taint of falsehood, or tendency to encourage sin. And the doctrine which is after godliness—exquisitely contrived to answer all the ends, and secure every interest, of real piety"—WESLEY.

"It appears that there were teachers in the Church — a sort of religious levellers — who preached that the converted servant had as much right to the master's service as the master had to his. Teachers of this kind have been in vogue long since the days of S. Paul and Timothy. Wholesome words—'healing doctrines,' which give nourishment and health to the soul, which is the true character of all the doctrines taught by our Lord Jesus Christ; doctrines which are according to godliness—securing as amply the honour and glory of God, as they do the peace, happiness, and final salvation of men. All this may refer to the general tenor of the gospel, and not to any things said by our Lord relative to the condition of slaves. With political questions, or questions relative to private rights, our Lord scarcely ever meddled; He taught all men to love one another, to respect each other's rights; to submit to each other, to show all fidelity, to be obedient, humble, and meek; and to show that His kingdom was not of this world"—CLARKE. These self-willed men, in consenting not to the sublime words of Christ, at the same time refused to acquiesce in the doctrine which insisted upon a holy life; for Christian truth is inseparable from purity, single-heartedness, self-forgetfulness, brave patience.

4. He is puffed up—"which is the cause of his not consenting to the doctrine which is after inward, practical religion. By this mark we may know them. Knowing nothing—as he ought to know. Sick of questions—doatingly fond of dispute—an evil, but common, disease; especially where practice is forgotten. Such, indeed, contend earnestly for singular phrases, and favourite points of their own. Everything else, however, like the preaching of Christ and His apostles, is all 'law,' and 'bondage,' and 'carnal reasoning.' Strifes of words—merely verbal controversies. Whereof cometh envy—of the gifts and successes of others. Contention—for the pre-eminence. Such disputants seldom like the prosperity of others, or to be less esteemed themselves. Evil surmisings—it not being their way to think well of those that differ from themselves in opinion"—WESLEY.

He is proud. "S. Paul with righteous anger flames out against these perverse men, who, using the name of Christ, substitute their short-sighted views of life for His, throw doubt and discredit upon the teaching of His chosen apostles and servants, stir up discord, excite party spirit, barring, often hopelessly, the onward march of Christianity. The true Christian teaching is healthy, practical, capable of being carried out by all orders in the state, by every age or sex, by bond and free. The spurious Christian maxims of these men deal with subtle, useless, unpractical questions, which have no influence on ordinary life, and only tend to stir up strife and useless inquiry, and to make men discontented and rebellious. These unhappy men he first characterises as 'proud,' lit. 'blinded with pride.' Knowing nothing—better rendered, 'yet without knowing anything'; having no real conception of the office and work of Christ in the world. S. Paul was writing, then, in the Spirit of the living God, and was warning no solitary pastor and friend at Ephesus of the weeds then springing up in that fair, newly-planted vineyard of his, but was addressing the Master's servants in many vineyards and of many ages; was telling them what would meet them, what would mar and spoil their work, and in not a few cases would break their hearts with sorrow"—C. B.

5. Supposing that gain is godliness—

"thinking the best religion is the getting of money—a far more common case than is usually supposed"—WESLEY.

"What S. Paul says of the opinions of these perverted men is not that they supposed gain to be godliness, but that they supposed 'godliness to be a means of gain.' They considered godliness, or rather the 'form of godliness' which was all they really possessed, to be a profitable investment. Christianity to them was a profession in the mercantile sense, and a profession that paid; and they embarked upon it, just as they would upon any other speculation which offered equally good hopes of being remunerative"—PLUMMER.

6. But godliness with content—"the inseparable companion of true, vital religion—is great gain—brings unspeakable profit in time, as well as in eternity"—WESLEY.

"The reasoning in the writer's mind was, probably, these false men suppose godliness will be turned into gain. Yes, though they were terribly mistaken, still there is a sense in which their miserable notion is true. True godliness is ever accompanied with perfect contentment. In this sense, godliness does bring along with it great gain to its possessor"—ELLICOTT. "The heart, amid every outward want, is only truly rich when it not only wants nothing which it has not, but has that which raises it above what it has not"—WIESINGER. Great gain. "There is a sense in which the sentiment of these men is true, if godliness is coupled with contentment, instead of covetousness, and its gain measured not by this life only but by eternity"—S. C.

7. Neither can we carry anything out—"to what purpose, then, do we heap together so many things? Oh, give me one thing—a safe and ready passage to my own country"—WESLEY.

"With a view to enforce what he has said S. Paul repeats two well-known and indisputable propositions—we brought nothing into the world and we can carry nothing out. Each statement, singly, has been abundantly proved by the experience of mankind, and no one would be likely to dispute either. One of the earliest books in human literature has them as its opening moral. 'Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither,' are Job's words in the day of his utter ruin; and they have been assented to by millions of hearts ever since. What right then have we to be discontented with what has been given to us? and what folly to spend all our time in amassing wealth, which at the time of our departure we shall be obliged to leave behind us! There is the case against avarice in a nutshell. Never contented. What a contrast to the godly man, who has found true independence in a trustful dependence upon the God whom he serves"—PLUMMER.

8. Covering—"that is, raiment and an house to cover us. This is all that a Christian needs, and all that his religion allows him to desire"—WESLEY.

The Greek word rendered let us be content is better translated "we shall have a sufficiency." The argument will run thus: "All earthly possessions are only for this life; here, if we have the wherewithal to clothe us and to nourish us, we shall have enough"; if we have more than this, S. Paul goes on to show, we shall be in danger of falling into temptation.

9. They that desire to be rich—"to have more than these; for then they would be so far rich, and the very desire banishes content, and exposes them to ruin. Fall—'plunge'—a sad gradation!—into temptation—miserable food for the soul!—and a snare—or trap. Dreadful 'covering'! And into many foolish and hurtful desires—which are sown and fed by having more than we need. Then farewell all hope of content! What then remains, but destruction for the body, and perdition for the soul?"—WESLEY.

Who wish to be rich—"make riches the object of their desire; for it is possible, as S. Chrysostom says, for one who has riches to employ them rightly while he sets no value on them. A snare—probably 'of the devil,' as ch. 3. 7. Drown men in—lit. 'sink men in the depths of'"—S. C. (See Prov. 28. 20.) Destruction and perdition—"'destruction' refers rather to wreck and ruin of the body, whilst 'perdition' belongs rather to that more awful ruin of the eternal soul. The gratification of desires, whether these desires are centred in the lower animal passions of the table, or in the pursuit of yet baser and more selfish passions still, invariably leads to the destruction of the poor frail human body first. This premature breaking up of the earthly tabernacle is the herald and precursor of the final perdition of the immortal soul"—ELLICOTT.

10. Love of money—"commonly called 'prudent care of what a man has'—is the root—the parent of all manner of evils—which some coveting have erred—lit. 'missed the mark.' They aimed not at faith, but at something else—and pierced themselves with many sorrows—from a guilty conscience, tormenting passions, desires contrary to reason, religion, and one another. How cruel are worldly men to themselves!"—WESLEY.

"This passage, in connection with ver. 7, appears to have been quoted from memory by Polycarp: 'But the beginning of all difficulties is covetousness. Knowing then that we brought nothing into the world, and that neither have we anything to carry out, let us arm ourselves,' etc. Many sorrows—such as anxieties, disappointments, desires, and pangs of conscience"—S. C. "His case is one of the most hopeless, whose desire for worldly advantage has settled down into a mere love of money. There is no vice more deadening to every noble and tender feeling than avarice. It is capable of extinguishing all mercy, all pity, all natural affection. It can banish from the heart not only all love, but all shame and self-respect. Assuredly the apostle is right when he calls the love of money a root of all kinds of evil. There is no iniquity to which it does not form one of the nearest roads. Every criminal who wants an accomplice can have the avaricious man as his helper, if he only bids high enough"—PLUMMER.

11. But thou, O man of God—"whatever else all the world do. A 'man of God' is either a prophet, a messenger of God, or a man devoted to God; a man of another world. Flee—as from a serpent, instead of coveting these things. Follow after righteousness—the whole image of God; though sometimes this word is used, not in the general, but in the particular acceptation, meaning only that single branch of it which is termed 'justice.' Faith—which is also taken here in the general and full sense—namely, a Divine, supernatural sight of God, chiefly in respect of His mercy in Christ. This 'faith' is the foundation of 'righteousness,' the support of godliness, the root of every grace of the Spirit. Love—this S. Paul intermixes with everything that is good: he, as it were, penetrates whatever he treats of with 'love,' the glorious spring of all inward and outward holiness"—WESLEY.

"It is not clear whether this appellative is addressed to Timothy as a Christian or as a minister. In a very true sense all Christians should be men of God; but to Timothy, who from a child had known the Scriptures, the name would suggest the prophet who came to Bethel (1 Kings 13. 1), Elijah and Ezekiel, and the lives and habits of these holy men, so opposed to covetousness and luxury. Flee these things—avarice and all the sins which grow from that root"—S. C. Christ cautions His disciples to beware of worldliness. (Luke 21. 34.) "Gold and popularity, gain and ease, were to be won with the sacrifice of apparently so little, but with this sacrifice Timothy would cease to be the man of God. To maintain that S. Paul was aware of any weakness already shown by his disciple and friend would, of course, be a baseless assertion; but that the older man dreaded for the younger these dangerous influences is clear. The term 'man of God' was the common Old Testament name for 'Divine messengers,' but under the new covenant the name seems extended to all just men faithful to the Lord Jesus. (See 2 Tim. 3. 17.) The solemn warning, then, through Timothy comes to each of His servants, Flee thou from covetousness. And follow after righteousness. 'The evil must be overcome with good' (Rom. 12. 21). The 'man of God,' tossing away from him all covetous longings, must press after 'righteousness'; here used in a general sense, signifying 'the inner life shaped after the Law of God.' Faith, love—the two characteristic virtues of Christianity. The one may be termed the hand that lays hold of God's mercy, and the other the mainspring of the Christian's life. Patience — that brave patience which, for Christ's sake, with a smile can bear up against all sufferings. Meekness—the meekness of heart and feeling with which a Christian acts towards his enemies. His conduct who 'when He was reviled, reviled not again' best exemplifies this virtue"—SPENCE.

12. Fight the good fight of faith—"not about words. Lay hold on eternal life—just before thee. Thou hast confessed the good confession—perhaps at his baptism: so likewise (ver. 13); but with a remarkable variation of the expression. Thou hast confessed the good confession before many witnesses—to which they all assented. He 'witnessed the good confession,' but Pilate did not assent to it"—WESLEY.

"Again, with the old stirring metaphor of the Olympic contests for a prize (1 Cor. 9. 24; Phil. 3. 13, 14)—the metaphor S. Paul loved so well, and which Timothy must have heard so often from his old master's lips as he preached and taught—he bids the 'man of God,' rising above the pitiful struggles for things perishable and useless, fight the noble fight of faith; bids him strive to lay hold of the real prize — life eternal. The emphasis rests here mainly on the words the good fight and eternal life. These things are placed in strong contrast with 'the struggle of the covetous' and its 'miserable, perishable crown.' 'The good fight,' more closely considered, is the contest and struggle which the Christian has to maintain against the world, the flesh, and the devil. It is styled the 'good fight of faith,' partly because the contest is waged on behalf of, for the sake of, the faith, but still more because from faith it derives its strength and draws its courage. Eternal life is the prize the 'man of God' must ever have before his eyes. It is the crown of life which the Judge of quick and dead will give to the 'faithful unto death.' (See Jas. 1. 12; Rev. 2. 10.) Whereunto thou art also called. The 'calling' here refers both to the inner and outward call to the Master's work. The inner call is the persuasion in the heart that the one vocation to which the life must be dedicated was the ministry of the word; and the outward call is the summons by S. Paul, ratified by the Church in the persons of the presbyters of Lystra"—C. B.

13. I charge thee before God who quickeneth all things—"who hath quickened thee, and will quicken thee at the great day"—WESLEY.

"The apostle having reminded Timothy of the confession of faith he made in the presence of many witnesses, now gives him charge, in the face of a more tremendous presence, not to disgrace it by failing to keep the commandment which the gospel imposes on the Christian"—ELLICOTT.

15. Which—"appearing. In His own times—the power, the knowledge, and the revelation of which remain in His eternal mind"—WESLEY.

In His own times—"ordained by Him, and known only to Him. The blessed, etc. These titles are applied to God the Son in Rev. 17. 14; 19. 16"—S. C.

16. Who only hath underived, independent, immortality. Dwelling in light unapproachable—to the highest angel. Whom no man hath seen, or can see—with bodily eyes. Yet 'we shall see Him as He is'"—WESLEY.

Immortality — "essential and underived, He being the essence and fount of all life. (John 5. 26.) Dwelling in the light, etc. Yet our Lord says of the pure in heart that 'they shall see God' (Matt. 5. 8), and holiness is a condition 'without which no man shall see the Lord' (Heb. 12. 14). The word 'see' must therefore be used in a different sense. Bishop Pearson distinguishes thus: God is invisible to the natural eye, both in man's natural and supernatural state; but the invisibility of the Divine essence does not prevent our clear intellectual vision of Him in our supernatural state. It has been thought that vers. 15, 16 are part of an ecclesiastical hymn"—S. C.

17. What follows seems to be a kind of a postscript. Charge the rich in this world—rich in such beggarly riches as this world affords. Not to be highminded—oh who regards this! Not to think better of themselves for their money, or anything it can purchase. Neither to trust in uncertain riches — which they may lose in an hour; either for happiness or defence—but in the living God—all the rest is dead clay. Who giveth us—as it were holding them out to us in His hand. All things—which we have. Richly—freely, abundantly. To enjoy—as His gift, in Him and for Him. When we use them thus, we do indeed 'enjoy' all things. Where else is there any notice taken of the 'rich,' in all the apostolic writings, save to denounce woes and vengeance upon them?"—WESLEY.

Charge them that are rich. "S. Paul had traced up the error of the false teachers—against whose work and influence he had so earnestly warned Timothy—to covetousness, to an unholy love of money; he then spoke of this unhappy covetousness—this greed of gain, this wish to be rich—as the root of every evil. From this fatal snare he warned the 'man of God' to flee, bidding him take courage in the high service to which he was dedicated, and to be fearless of all consequences, for he served the King of kings. But in the congregations of Ephesus there were many, owing to birth or to other circumstances, already rich and powerful, already in the possession of gold and rank, in varied degrees. Before closing the letter to the chief pastor, Timothy, he must add a word of encouragement and also of special warning to these. Above all things, he would have no mistake as to his meaning; the wish to be rich was a sure root of error and of evil, but the being rich was a very different thing; this class was surrounded, indeed, with special perils, but still, even as rich they might serve God faithfully. So in his charge to them he commands them not to strip themselves of their wealth, but to use it wisely, generously. Who giveth us, etc. The rich should set their affections and place their trust, not in these uncertain riches, but in God, the bestower of them, who wills, too, that His creatures should find pleasure in these His gifts—given to us to enjoy. This is another of the many sayings of the old man S. Paul, in which he urges on the people of God, that their kind Master in heaven not only allows men reasonable pleasures and gratifications, but even Himself abundantly provide such for them"—C. B.

18. To do good—"to make this their daily employ, that they may be rich—may abound in all good works. Ready to distribute—singly to particular persons. Willing to communicate—to join in all public works of charity"—WESLEY.

"Rather, free in giving, ready in sharing, i.e. with others. These words seem to point to the highest enjoyment procurable by these rich—the luxury of doing good, of helping others to be happy, the only enjoyment that never fails, never disappoints. Ready to distribute, willing to communicate. In distinguishing between these words, which are nearly synonymous, the first points rather to the hand which generously gives, and the second to the heart which lovingly sympathises. The first obeys willingly the Master's charge, 'Give to him that asketh'; the second follows that loving command which bids His own to rejoice with those that rejoice, and to mourn with those that mourn"—ELLICOTT.

19. Treasuring up for themselves a good foundation—"of an abundant reward, by the free mercy of God—that they may lay hold on eternal life. This cannot be done by almsdeeds; yet they 'come up for a memorial before God' (Acts 10. 4). And the lack even of this may be the cause why God will withhold grace and salvation from us"—WESLEY.

(Comp. our Lord's words in Luke 16. 9, where the same truth is taught, and a similar promise made.)

20. Keep that which is committed to thy care—"the charge I have given thee (ch. 1. 18.) Avoid profane empty babblings. How weary of controversy was this acute disputant! And knowledge falsely so called—most of the ancient heretics were great pretenders to knowledge"—WESLEY.

That which is committed to thy trust. "The words following prove by the contrast that it is the deposit of sound doctrine, which it had been entrusted to Timothy to keep and to teach. Science—rather, 'the knowledge.' 'The oppositions' were probably the attacks of those who were already beginning to arrogate to their teaching the name of gnosis, 'knowledge,' and were introducing the different elements which afterwards made up the systems called Gnosticism"—S. C.

21. Which some professing have erred concerning the faith. In this most probably wild and visionary "knowledge," the false teachers and their hearers sought salvation and a rule of life, and they miserably failed in their efforts. The result with them was, that they lost all hold on the great doctrine of faith in a crucified Saviour.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

"THIS Epistle was probably wrote by S. Paul, during his second confinement at Rome, not long before his martyrdom. It is, as it were, the swan's dying song. But though it was wrote many years after the former, yet they are both of the same kind, and nearly resemble each other.

"IT HAS THREE PARTS—

CHAPTER I.

Vers. 1, 2. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION.—Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God.—As in the Epistles to the Corinthians, the Ephesians, and Colossians, he ascribes his apostleship to the sovereign will and election of God. Apart from any merit or work of his own, God chose him for the office. He neither aspired to it nor wished for it. The reference to the Almighty will in this Epistle is singularly in harmony with the spirit of calm resignation which breathes through it. It was that sovereign will which chose him as an apostle, which guided him all through that eventful life of his, and which brought him to the prison of Cæsar, where, face to face with death, he wrote this last letter to his friend and disciple Timothy.

2. Timothy was S. Paul's own son in the faith, and he was also dearly beloved.

Vers. 3–5. EXPRESSIONS OF AFFECTION.—3.

Whom I serve from my forefathers—"that is, whom both I and my ancestors served—with a pure conscience. He always worshipped God according to his conscience, both before and after his conversion. One who stands on the verge of life is much refreshed by the remembrance of his predecessors, to whom he is going"—WESLEY.

"Whom I serve from my forefathers—that is, with the devotion and love I have inherited as a sacred family tradition. S. Paul was here referring, not to the great forefathers of the Jewish race—Abraham, Isaac, and the patriarchs—but to the members of his own family, who, he states, were religious, faithful persons. That without ceasing I have remembrance of thee—better rendered, 'as unceasing is the remembrance which . . .' This long parenthetical sentence leads up to the point for which S. Paul was so deeply thankful to God—namely, the true faith of Timothy himself. These unstudied words tell us something of the inner life of such a one as S. Paul, how ceaselessly, unweariedly he prayed, night as well as day. The object, too, of S. Paul was not S. Paul, but Timothy"—SPENCE.

4. Being mindful of thy tears—"perhaps frequently shed, as well as at the apostle's last parting with him"—WESLEY.

Thy tears—"shed probably by Timothy when his aged master had last taken leave of him. It is likely that the clouds of danger which were gathering thickly round S. Paul towards the close of his career had oppressed the brave-hearted apostle with a foreboding of coming evil, and had invested the last parting with Timothy with circumstances of unusual solemnity. S. Paul had affected others besides Timothy with the same great love, so that tears were shed by strong men when he bade them farewell. (See Acts 20. 37, 38)"—ELLICOTT.

5. Which dwelt—"a word not applied to a transient guest, but only to a settled inhabitant—first—probably this was before Timothy was born, yet not beyond S. Paul's memory"—WESLEY.

We know, in the course of his second missionary journey (Acts 16. 1-3), S. Paul was brought into contact with this pious family at Lystra. Timothy owed much of his spiritual life and godly character to the gracious influences of his early home life. "The mothers of the kings of Judah are constantly mentioned, and, as they were good or evil, so were their children"—TRAPP.

Vers. 6-14. EXHORTATION TO EARNESTNESS AND FIDELITY.—6. Wherefore—"because I remember this—I remind thee of stirring up—lit. blowing up the coals into a flame—the gift of God—all the spiritual gifts, which the grace of God has given thee"—WESLEY.

"Stir up—kindle into a flame, as a fire in danger of smouldering out. The gift of God, etc. The special gift (as in 1 Tim. 4. 14), bestowed by God on Timothy at his ordination, to qualify him for, and to give effect to, the work of the ministry, the outward sign of obsignation and imparting of which was the imposition of the hands of the apostle, together with those of the body of the presbyters"—S. C.

7. "And let nothing discourage thee, for God hath not given us. That is, the spirit which God hath given us Christians, is not the spirit of fear—or cowardice—but of power—banishing fear—and love and sobriety. These animate us in our duties to God, our brethren, and ourselves. 'Power' and 'sobriety' are two good extremes. 'Love' is between, the tie and temperament of both; preventing the two bad extremes of fearfulness and rashness. More is said concerning power, ver. 8; concerning love, 2 Tim. 2. 14, etc.; concerning sobriety, 2 Tim. 3. 1, etc."—WESLEY.

"The spirit with which we are endowed is a spirit of power, whereas a spirit of fearfulness is weak. Faintheartedness cannot be strong. It is only by acting, and by acting vigorously and courageously, that we find out the full power of the spirit with which we have been blessed. Of love—which more than anything else casts out the spirit of fear. Moreover, the spirit of love teaches us the nature of the gift of power. It is not force or violence; not an imposing of our own will on others. It is an affectionate striving to win others over to obedience to the will of God. It is the spirit of self-sacrifice, not of self-assertion. And of a sound mind (R.V. 'discipline'). By discipline that cowardly indolence, which the spirit of fearfulness engenders, can be kept down and expelled"—PLUMMER.

8. Therefore be not thou ashamed—"when fear is banished, shame also flees away—of the testimony of our Lord—the gospel and of testifying the truth of it to all men. Nor of me—the cause of the servants of God doing His work, cannot be separated from the cause of God Himself. But be thou partaker of the afflictions—which I endure for the gospel's sake. According to the power of God—this which overcomes all things is nervously described in the two next verses"—WESLEY.

"The testimony of our Lord—i.e. of bearing testimony, as an Evangelist, to the incarnation, life, death, resurrection, doctrine, and precepts of our Lord Jesus Christ. (Comp. Acts 1. 8.) Nor of me His prisoner. A prisoner, indeed, but the Lord's prisoner, not only for His sake, but by His will. According to the power of God. Either 'in accordance with the power of His grace working in us and enabling us,' or, 'in accordance with the power which He has displayed in saving us'"—S. C. This testimony, of which Timothy was not to be ashamed, of course includes the sufferings and the shame of Christ. In these, before mocking, scornful men, must Timothy, as an example to the flock, rather glory; but "the testimony" signifies much more than what relates only to the Passion story. The Christian, instead of being ashamed of his "profession," must before the world show fearlessly that its hopes and its promises are his most precious treasure. Neither Timothy, nor any Christian must shrink from openly espousing the unpopular cause of the Crucified, or from publicly declaring their sympathy with its hated martyrs.

9. Who hath saved us—"by faith. The love of the Father, the grace of our Saviour, and the whole economy of salvation, are here admirably described. Having called us with an holy calling—which is all from God, and claims us all for God. According to His own purpose and grace—that is, His own gracious purpose—which was given us—fixed for our advantage, before the world began"——WESLEY.

CALVIN pithily remarks: "If God chose us before the creation of the world, He could not have considered the question of our works, which could have had no existence at a period when we ourselves were not." And ELLICOTT says: "S. Paul now specifies the manner in which the power of God has been displayed toward us. Who hath saved us. This comprehends all God's dealings with us in respect to our redemption. Again, as so frequently in these Pastoral Epistles, is the First Person of the blessed Trinity referred to as the Saviour."

10. By the appearing of our Saviour. "This implies His whole abode upon earth. Who hath abolished death—taken away its sting, and turned it into a blessing. And hath brought life and immortality to light—hath clearly revealed by the gospel that immortal life which He hath purchased for us"—WESLEY.

"Now made manifest. (Comp. Tit. 2. 11, 'The grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared.') The appearing. Here and in Tit. 2. 11, the incarnation, life, and ministry of our Saviour Jesus Christ, elsewhere usually of His return in glory. Who hath abolished death—rather, 'taken from death its power,' rendered it impotent. (Comp. 1 Cor. 15. 26, 55, and Heb. 2. 14, 15.) And hath brought, etc.—rather 'hath thrown light upon,' hath lit up man's true and endless life, and the incorruption of his whole being, body and soul. These were truths before, but indistinct and lost in gloom; but the Light of the world, at His appearing, shone upon them; and they stand out distinct, as objects of faith and 'blessed hope.' Through the gospel—the instrumental means of making known the appearing of the Saviour, with all which He revealed"—S. C. "Who hath abolished death—more accurately, 'when He abolished or made of none effect.' The Greek word thus rendered, signifies that, by the action of the Lord, death was rendered inoperative, comparatively harmless; its sting was removed. The 'death' thus made of none effect has a far more extended meaning than that separation of soul and body we are in the habit of calling death. It signifies that awful punishment of sin which is best described as the exact opposite to 'eternal life.' The death we are acquainted with by sad experience here is only the forerunner of the death eternal. Already to the believers in Jesus this death of the body counts for nothing; the time will come when it will even exist no more. And hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. The Greek word rendered 'immortality' is more accurately translated by 'incorruption.' 'Life' here is that true life, in its highest and completest sense, which includes the most perfect happiness—a happiness a foretaste of which is enjoyed on this side the grave; over it (this bliss) death now has no power"—C. B.

12. That which I have committed to Him—"my soul—until that day—of His final appearing"—WESLEY.

S. Paul had entrusted his deathless soul to the keeping of his Heavenly Father, and having done this, serene and joyful, he waited for the end. His disciple Timothy must do the same. So may every man who can say, For I know whom I have believed—or better rendered, "whom I have trusted."

13. The pattern of sound words—"the model of pure wholesome doctrine"—WESLEY.

"The very frequent reference to the sound healthy words in these Epistles by S. Paul, and from which he urges his disciples never to depart, indicate to us the deep importance S. Paul and the first generation of believers attached to the very words and expressions used by the apostles and those who had been with the Lord"—ELLICOTT.

14. The good thing—"this wholesome doctrine"—WESLEY.

Rather, Guard that good deposit—of a sound faith to be held by himself and taught to others. "S. Paul," says BENGEL, "when his departure was at hand, had two deposits: one to be committed to God, the other to Timothy."

Vers. 15–2. 26. REFERENCE TO SOME WHO HAD FALLEN AWAY FROM THE FAITH, AND EXHORTATION TO TIMOTHY TO STEADFASTNESS. —15. All who are in Asia—"who had attended me at Rome for a while—are turned away from me. What! from Paul the aged, the faithful soldier, and now prisoner of Christ! This was a glorious trial, and wisely reserved for that time, when he was on the borders of immortality. Perhaps a little measure of the same spirit might remain with him under whose picture are those affecting words, 'The true effigy of Francis Xavier, Apostle of the Indies; forsaken of all men; dying in a cottage'"—WESLEY.

The geographical term Asia is rather vague. It may, and indeed strictly speaking, does, include, Mysia, Phrygia, Lydia, Caria; but such a widespread defection from Pauline teaching seems improbable, and there is no tradition that anything of the kind ever took place. Of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes. "These names would at once suggest to Timothy the men and the congregations of 'Asia' to whom S. Paul was alluding—names well known doubtless, then, and especially to persons in the position of Timothy; but no tradition has been preserved which throws any light on the lives and actions of these traitorous friends of S. Paul"—ELLICOTT.

16. The family of Onesiphorus—"as well as himself—hath often refreshed me—both at Ephesus and Rome"—WESLEY.

"All I said, yet not quite all; there are exceptions. There is the household of Onesiphorus: may God have mercy upon it and him. Ashamed of my chain. A prisoner in free custody was chained by one wrist to the soldier who kept him. (See Acts 28. 16.) This may be the explanation of the singular 'chain,' and a natural and undesigned coincidence between the Epistle and the fact"—S. C.

17. Very diligently. Bishop Pearson, assuming that the greater diligence was rendered necessary by the greater severity of S. Paul's captivity, argues hence for the fact of a second captivity.

18. The Lord, thus repeated, may be little more than the reciprocal pronoun "himself," a little emphasised (Bengel), especially if the expression "may the Lord" (Alford) had become a formula of prayer and blessing.

CHAPTER II.

1. Thou, therefore. Since all in Asia, with some few exceptions, such as Onesiphorus and his family, have turned away from me, do thou, then, be strong, but not as men understand strength or firmness; but do thou be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus—that is, be strong in the power of that inward sanctification which enables a man to will and to do according to what God has commanded, in the power of that inward sanctification which alone proceeds from Christ, and which will never be wanting to anyone who is in Christ; in other words, "Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might" (Eph. 6. 10). In his own strength he will be able to do nothing, but in the grace which Christ freely bestows on all believers who ask it of Him, Timothy will be able to find all he needs.

2. The things—"the wholesome doctrine. (2 Tim. 1. 13.) Commit—before thou leavest Ephesus—to faithful men who will be able, after thou art gone, to teach others"—WESLEY.

"This may be considered as the earliest trace of the formation of a theological school, a school which has for its object not merely the instruction of the ignorant, but the protection and maintenance of a definite body of doctrine. That which the apostle, when he was in Ephesus, publicly taught, under the sanction of a multitude of witnesses, is to be preserved and handed on without compromise or corruption as a pattern of wholesome doctrine"—PLUMMER.

3, 4, 5. No man that warreth entangleth himself—"any more than is unavoidable—in the affairs of this life—with worldly business or cares—that—minding war only—he may please his captain. In this and the next verse there is a plain allusion to the Roman law of arms, and to that of the Grecian games. According to the former, no soldier was to engage in any civil employment; according to the latter, none could be crowned as conqueror who did not keep strictly to the rules of the game"—WESLEY.

"In this passage S. Paul makes use of three figures: husbandry, athletic contest, and military service. The last-named is the illustration he most frequently uses. Every Christian, and especially every Christian minister, may be regarded as a soldier, as an athlete, as a husbandman; but, of the three similitudes, the one which fits him best is that of a soldier. Military service involves self-sacrifice, endurance, discipline, vigilance, obedience, ready co-operation with others, sympathy, enthusiasm, loyalty. It implies also vigilant, unwearying, and organised opposition to a vigilant, unwearying, and organised foe. S. Paul does not suggest that Christians should keep aloof from the affairs of this life, which would be a flat contradiction of what he teaches elsewhere. (1 Thess. 4. 11, 12.) He has a duty to perform in the affairs of this life, but in doing it he is not to be entangled in them. They are means, not ends; and must be made to help him on, not suffered to keep him back. If they become entanglements instead of opportunities, he will soon lose that state of constant preparation and alertness which is the indispensable condition of success"—PLUMMER.

6, 7. "Unless he labour first he will reap no fruit"—WESLEY.

"It is the enduring, patient, self-sacrificing toil that is rewarded in the affairs of common life—the man that 'endures hardness,' whether as a soldier, or athlete, or tiller of the ground, wins the reward; and as in the world, so in religion. Further on in the Epistle the apostle speaks of his having won the crown of righteousness. He had endured hardness of every conceivable kind; every affliction for the Lord's sake he had endured save death, and that he was expecting, and knew it could not long tarry. The teaching of S. Paul in this triple picture is—not every soldier wins his commander's applause, but only the veteran who devotes himself heart and soul to his profession; not every athlete wins the crown or prize, but only he who trains with anxious, painful care; not every tiller of the ground gathers the earth's fruits, but only the patient toiler. So must it be in religious life. It is not enough to say we are Christians, or even to wish to be of the brotherhood of Christ. Men must really live the life they say they love"—SPENCE.

8. Of the seed of David—"this one genealogy attend to"—WESLEY.

Remember—"bear in mind. The connection seems to be, But with all its toils and sufferings the gospel has also its stores of abounding consolation. The remembrance of the risen and victorious Saviour is the comfort and support of His ministers"—S. C.

9. Is not bound—"not hindered in its course"—WESLEY.

I.e. although they may bind me, while I am in prison at Rome, the gospel is running its free course over the whole Roman world.

10. Therefore—"encouraged by this, that 'the word of God is not bound'—I endure all things. See the spirit of a real Christian! Who would not wish to be like-minded? Salvation is deliverance from all evil; glory, the enjoyment of all good"—WESLEY.

"The question has been often asked, whether those elect for whom the apostle endured these things were, when he wrote these words, believers. It may be answered, with some certainty, that the elect here spoken of include both believers and unbelievers. The first, the believer, would in all ages be built up by the contemplation of the steadfastness under the suffering of S. Paul; the second, the unbeliever, would be won to the faith by the divinely-inspired arguments and exhortations which the brave old man ceaselessly spoke or wrote down in prison just as when free"—ELLICOTT.

11. Dead with Him—"dead to sin, and ready to die for Him"—WESLEY.

Death with Him involves, surely, life with Him too? In that life of His we shall share; we shall be partakers in this life of His there, but only if we have shared in the life of suffering which was His life here.

12. If we deny Him—"to escape suffering for Him"—WESLEY.

"This sentence is a contrast with the two preceding. (Comp. Matt. 10. 33; 2 Pet. 2. 1; Jude 4.) The words here refer specially to the verbal denial of Christ, made through fear of suffering. If we prove so unfaithful, He will not recognise us as His own, the result of which will be that we remain in a state without grace and without blessing"—HUTHER.

13. If we believe not—"that is, though some believe not, God will make good all His promises to them that do believe—He cannot deny Himself—His word cannot fa "—WESLEY.

"If we believe not—better rendered 'if we are faithless'—that is, untrue to the vows of our Christian profession. The faithlessness implies more than mere unbelief in any of the fundamental doctrines of the faith, such as the resurrection of the Lord or His divinity. Yet He abideth faithful: He cannot deny Himself—those who have understood these words as containing soothing, comforting voices for the sinner, for the faithless Christian who has left his first love, are gravely mistaken. The passage is one of distinct severity, may even be termed one of the sternest in the Book of Life; for it tells how it is impossible even for the pitiful Redeemer to forgive in the future life. 'He cannot deny Himself'—cannot treat the faithless as though he were faithful, cannot act as though faithfulness and faithlessness were one and the same thing. The Christian teacher, such as Timothy, and the members of his flock likewise, must remember that, sure and certain as are the promises of glory and happiness to those who love the Lord and try to live His life, so surely will fall the chastisement on all who are faithless and untrue. With the solemn words of this 'faithful saying' S. Paul closes this, the second division of his Epistle—fellowship in the sufferings of Christ here, on this side the grave, and fellowship in the glory of Christ there, on the other side the grave—the one side was the sure consequence of the other; the one could not exist without the other"—SPENCE.

14. Remind them—"who are under thy charge. Oh how many unnecessary things are thus unprofitably, nay hurtfully, contended for"—WESLEY.

"Charging them, etc. Solemnly charging them in the presence of the Lord (see 1 Tim. 5. 21) not to dispute about words (1 Tim. 6. 4), useful for nothing, tending to the subversion, the overthrow, rather than the edification or the building up of the hearers"—S. C. "The spirit of controversy is a bad thing in itself, but the evil is intensified when the subject of controversy is a question of words. Principles are things worth striving about, when opposition to what we know to be right and true is unavoidable. But disputatiousness about words is something like proof that love of self has taken the place of love of truth"—PLUMMER.

15. A workman that needeth not to be ashamed—"either of unfaithfulness or unskilfulness. Rightly dividing the word of truth—duly explaining and applying the whole Scripture, so as to give each hearer his due portion. But they that give one part of the gospel to all (the promises and comforts to unawakened, hardened, scoffing men) have real need to be ashamed"—WESLEY.

Rightly dividing, etc.—lit. "cutting straight." "The figure has been very variously derived: from a priest dividing the victim, a steward distributing the bread or stores, a stonemason, a carpenter, a ploughman, a road-cutter. The last has been most frequently adopted. Perhaps they are right who, like Huther and Alford, consider that the figure had become almost lost sight of in common usage, and that the word had come to mean little more than to 'manage' or administer"—S. C.

16. They — "who babble thus will grow worse and worse"—WESLEY.

"These empty profanities, with their philosophic pretentiousness, had done much harm already, and would do still more; for the men who propagate them would certainly go still greater lengths in impiety; and they must receive no encouragement"—PLUMMER.

17. And their word—"if they go on, will be mischievous as well as vain, and will eat as a gangrene"—WESLEY.

"The substitution of gangrene for cancer is an improvement, as giving the exact word used in the original. Gangrene poisons the whole frame, and quickly becomes fatal. The apostle foresees that doctrines, which really ate out the very heart of Christianity, were likely to become very popular in Ephesus, and would do incalculable mischief. The nature of these doctrines we gather from what follows"—PLUMMER.

18. Saying the resurrection is already past—"perhaps asserting that it is only the spiritual passing from death unto life"—WESLEY.

"Who concerning the truth have erred—or, 'have erred,' or, more literally, 'have missed their aim.' The resurrection of the body, grounded upon the Lord's own words (John 5. 28, 29) was one of the articles of the Christian faith upon which S. Paul especially loved to dwell. (See, for instance, his words before Felix, Acts 24. 15.) With this 'resurrection of the body,' S. Paul, prompted by the Holy Ghost, taught men that the future state of rewards and punishments was intimately bound up; the soul will be clothed with a body of glory or with a body of shame, according to the deeds done in the flesh. This doctrine appears in very early times to have been questioned by some in the Christian community. Then, as now, was the thought repugnant to the shrinking soul of man—that the body in which he then lived and sinned would rise again"—SPENCE.

19. But the foundation of God — "His truth and faithfulness — standeth fast—can never be overthrown; being as it were sealed with a seal, which has an inscription on each side—on the one, The Lord knoweth those that are His; on the other, Let everyone who nameth the name of the Lord, as His Lord, depart from iniquity. Indeed, they only are His who depart from iniquity. To all others He will say, 'I know you not' (Matt. 7. 22, 23)"—WESLEY.

"Nevertheless, God's firm foundation standeth. Nevertheless, that is to say, though some may be shaken in faith by the unhappy teaching above referred to, yet assuredly God's firm foundation stands unshaken. 'The firm foundation laid by God' is the Church of Christ, which is here termed 'a foundation' laid by God, because it, the Church of Christ, is the ground-storey of the glorious temple of the future. In other words, the Church of Christ is here considered as the foundation of a far grander building, which, in the fulness of time, will rest upon its massive work (see Eph. 2. 19–21); and this ground-storey, the corner-stone of which is Christ, 'standeth age after age, in spite of any efforts which may be made to destroy or even to shake it.' The term 'foundation,' here used for the Church of God on earth, is remarkable, and points to a great truth: that after all, this life is but a beginning, and that 'His Church' here is but a foundation—is only the first and early storey of that glorious Church the Divine Architect has planned, and will complete in heaven"—C. B.

20. But in a great house—"such as the Church, it is not strange that there are not only vessels of gold and silver, designed for honourable uses, but also of wood and of earth—for less honourable purposes. Yet a vessel even of gold may be put to the vilest use, though it was not the design of him that made it"—WESLEY.

"But though the foundation of the Church bears the stamp, not only of God's decrees, but of holiness, yet in it, as in every large house, there will be evil and imperfection mingled with the good. Some to honour, etc.—i.e. 'some for trivial and common uses.' So there are in God's Church two classes, though each admitting of degrees. (Comp. Matt. 13. 30, 47)"—S. C.

21. If a man purge himself from these—"vessels of dishonour, so as to have no fellowship with them"—WESLEY.

If a man therefore purge himself from these—"again the reference is general, but there was a special thought for Timothy when S. Paul wrote this. If he would separate from all that was evil in the church at Ephesus, then would he indeed be one of those golden vessels unto honour. The image of the great house, and its many and varied vessels, though still not quite lost sight of, is passing out of sight. This verse changes into a note of direct exhortation. The good and faithful must separate themselves from the evil and faithless"—C. B.

22. Flee youthful desires—"those peculiarly incident to youth. Follow peace with them—unity with all true believers. Out of a pure heart. 'Youthful desires' destroy this purity: righteousness, faith, love, peace, accompany it"—WESLEY.

Flee also youthful lusts. But he who would indeed become "a vessel of honour" in that great house of God must do more than merely separate himself from all outward communion and friendship with men who, by their teaching and in their lives, did dishonour to the Master's religion. There was an inner work to be accomplished, as well as an outer and more public protest to be made. He must fight with and conquer those lusts, passions, and desires which are more peculiarly tempting to those who are still in the meridian of life.

24. A servant of the Lord must not—"eagerly or passionately—strive—as do the vain wranglers spoken of (ver. 23). But be apt to teach—chiefly by patience and unwearied assiduity"—WESLEY.

"Conciliation may be termed the keynote of these directions. S. Paul would press upon Timothy and his successors the great truth that it was the Master's will that the unnumbered peoples who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death should learn, by slow though sure degrees, how lovely and desirable a thing it was to be a Christian; should come at length to see clearly that Christ was, after all, the only lover and real friend of man. Apt to teach, patient. The Greek word is better rendered by the 'forbearing' of the margin than by 'patient.' 'Patient of wrong,' however, best gives the full force of the original. This is what the servant of God should really aim at being: the teacher rather than the controversialist—rather the patient endurer of wrong than the fomenter of dissensions and wordy strifes"—C. B.

25. In meekness. "He has often need of zeal, always of meekness. If haply God—for it is wholly His work—may give them repentance—the acknowledging of the truth would then quickly follow"—WESLEY.

"By those that oppose themselves, S. Paul alludes scarcely so much to those leading teachers of false doctrine as to those led away by them. Their treatment was to be a gentle one. If God peradventure will give them repentance. The Greek original here also carries out what was said of the 'servant of the Lord,' in the words immediately preceding—'patient of wrong,' 'forbearing,' 'meek.' It suggests the hope that at some time or other God's grace would work in those 'opposing' members of the congregation a change. The repentance here signifies an abandonment on the part of those erring Christians of that wrong course on which they had entered, and a return to the true Church of God, and to a full knowledge of the gospel truth"—ELLICOTT.

26. Who—"at present are not only captives, but asleep; utterly insensible of their captivity"—WESLEY.

"The deadly peril of all 'captives of sin' is here well painted. These unhappy ones, before they can free themselves from the toils of the evil one, must awake from the deep slumber in which they are wrapped; in other words, must first be conscious of their awful danger. Who are taken captive by him at his will. These words have been variously interpreted by commentators. The meaning that, on the whole, seems most satisfactory, represents the captive to sin waking up from his deathly slumber and escaping the toils of the evil one, for the purpose of carrying out for the future the will of God. The rendering of the whole verse would be as follows, And that they may recover themselves out of the snares of the devil—being held captive by him to do His (God's) will"—SPENCE.

CHAPTER III.

Vers. 1-9. WARNING OF EVIL TIMES, EVIL TEACHERS, AND EVIL MEN, ALREADY IN THE CHURCH.—1. In the last days—"the time of the gospel dispensation, commencing at the time of our Lord's death, is peculiarly styled the 'last days.' Grievous—troublesome and dangerous"—WESLEY.

"Such announcements as those in ch. 2. 20, 26, must have fallen damp and disappointing on the expectations of many in the first ardour of the gospel. Vessels for dishonour even in God's house—captives taken by Satan at his will, even after the prince of this world had been triumphed over on the cross—these were facts at variance, doubtless, with the expectations of many believers, but necessary to be known. The warning, therefore, continues. In the last days. The time of the gospel dispensation, which is the last of the Divine dispensations, and it is to continue till the consummation of all things. It is clear from ver. 5 that Timothy himself was living in them. Perilous times will come, when, perhaps, they might be least expected"—S. C.

2. "For men—even in the Church—will be—in great numbers, and to a higher degree than ever—lovers of themselves—only, not their neighbours, the first root of evil. Lovers of money—the second"—WESLEY.

Lovers of themselves. The vice of self-love breaks all the bonds of charity, and is one of the deepest marks of human depravity. Covetous—lit. "lovers of silver," and "the love of money is the root of all evil"—SUTCLIFFE. Selfishness well heads the dreary list. It is the true root of all sin.

3. Without natural affection—"to their own children. Intemperate, fierce—both too soft and too hard"—WESLEY.

Without natural affection—"careless and regardless of the welfare of those connected with them by ties of blood. Truce-breakers—i.e. 'implacable.' False-accusers or 'slanderers.' (See 1 Tim. 3. 11.) Incontinent—having no control over the passions. Despisers, etc.—better rendered, 'no lovers of good,' that is, hostile to every good thought and work"—ELLICOTT.

4. Lovers of sensual pleasure—"which naturally extinguishes all love and sense of God"—WESLEY.

Heady—i.e. "hasty, violent, rash." High-minded—rather, "blinded (or puffed up) with pride." (Comp. 1 Tim. 3. 6.) ELLICOTT says:

"The enumeration of vices in Rom. 1. 29 seq., describes heathenism; this describes corrupt Christianity."

5. Having a form—"an appearance of godliness, but not regarding, nay even denying and blaspheming, the inward power and reality of it. Is not this eminently fulfilled at this day?"—WESLEY.

Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof—"keeping up a show of observing the outward forms of religion, but renouncing its power and its influence over the heart and the life; showing openly that they neither acknowledged its guidance or wished to do so. These, by claiming the title of Christians, wearing before men the uniform of Christ, but by their lives dishonouring His name, did the gravest injury to the holy Christian cause. From such turn away. These, daring to assume the sacred name, no doubt with the thought of claiming its glorious promises, without one effort to please the Master, or to do honour to His name—these were to be openly shunned by such as Timothy. No half measures were to be adopted towards these, who tried to deceive their neighbours and possibly deceive themselves. The pagan was to be courteously entreated, for in God's good time the glory of the Lord might shine, too, on those now sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death. The heretic, seduced by false men from the school of the apostles, where the life as well as the doctrine of Jesus was taught, was to be gently instructed. Perhaps God would lead him once more home. But these who, while pretending to belong to Jesus, lived the degraded life of the heathen, were to be shunned. No communion, no friendly intercourse, was possible between the hypocrite and the Christian"—SPENCE.

6. Of these—"that is, mere formalists"—WESLEY.

Mosheim thinks that the three participial clauses describe the three different classes of the heretics—(1) sinners, (2) seekers after happiness, (3) devotees; they rather denote various traits in the same persons, and "the very union of such traits is characteristic"—DE WETTE. It is no matter of surprise that the heretics, to win more followers, turned their attentions to the fair sex; that has been done by heretics in all ages.

7. Ever learning—"new things—but not the truth of God"—WESLEY.

Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. "A morbid love of novelty, and a hope to penetrate into mysteries not revealed to God's true teachers, spurred these female learners on; but 'to the full knowledge of the truth'—for this is the more accurate rendering of the Greek word—they never reached, for by their evil life their heart was hardened. That some of these false teachers laid claim to occult arts, to a knowledge of magic and sorcery, is clear from the statement contained in the next verse, where certain sorcerers of the time of Moses are compared to them."

8. "Several ancient writers speak of Jannes and Jambres, as the chief of the Egyptian magicians. Men of corrupt minds—impure notions and wicked inclinations. Void of judgment—quite ignorant, as well as careless, of true, spiritual religion"—WESLEY.

"Jannes and Jambres were the traditional names preserved among the Jews of the principal magicians of Pharaoh's court. ORIGEN states that S. Paul is quoting from an apocryphal book, called the Book of Jambres and Mambres; but of such a book there is no trace. The tradition makes them the sons of Balaam, who foretold the birth of Moses, counselled the persecutions of the Israelites, and were either drowned in the Red Sea, or perished in the slaughter after making the golden calf"—S. C.

9. They shall proceed no further—"in gaining proselytes"—WESLEY.

The resemblance of the case of the men to whom S. Paul alludes to that of the Egyptian magicians was in their opposition to the truth, in the complete exposure of their folly, and possibly (as Ellicott thinks) in the occult arts to which they alike pretended.

10, 11. "Timothy, and perhaps Timothy only, had been almost constantly with S. Paul from his second missionary journey till the time when he was left by him at Ephesus"—WORDSWORTH. At Antioch, in Pisidia. (Acts 13. 50.) If writing to almost anyone but Timothy, it would have been necessary to specify this; or the Syrian Antioch, being by far the best known, would have been understood"—S. C.

12. All that are resolved to live godly—"therefore count the cost. Art thou resolved? In Christ—out of Christ there is no godliness. Shall suffer persecution—more or less. There is no exception. Either the truth of Scripture fails, or those that think they are religious, and are not persecuted in some shape or other on that very account, deceive themselves"—WESLEY.

Yea, and all that will live godly. "But S. Paul would not allow it to be thought for a moment that in the fact of his enduring persecution and suffering there was anything remarkable or singular; so he adds the words of this verse, which repeat in a peculiarly solemn way the great Christian truth, that eternal glory was only to be reached by man through an avenue of sufferings."

13. Deceiving and being deceived. "He who has once begun to deceive others is both the less likely to recover from his own error, and the more ready to embrace the errors of other men"—WESLEY.

MATTHIES thus states the connection between this and the preceding verses: "Quite different is it with evil men, who, instead of suffering for the truth, proceed always further in their wickedness." The apostle here continues the description of the heretics which was interrupted at ver. 10.

14. From whom—"even from me a teacher approved of God"—WESLEY.

"To the good testimony given to Timothy by S. Paul in ver. 10 there is added the exhortation to stand steadfast in the truth. Timothy had already been instructed in the truth of the gospel before S. Paul met with him, nay, even before this instruction he had been carefully made acquainted with the Holy Scriptures. This very fact, that from childhood he had been under the influence of Divine truth, and been nourished by the bread of life, was to be an incentive to him to adhere faithfully to this word of truth"—HUTHER.

15. From an infant thou hast known the Holy Scriptures—"of the Old Testament. These only were extant when Timothy was an infant. Which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith in the Messiah that was to come. How much more are the Old and New Testament together able, in God's hand, to make us more abundantly wise unto salvation! Even such a measure of present salvation as was not known before Jesus was glorified"—WESLEY.

From a child. "The rabbis mention five as the age at which Jewish children are to begin to read the Law. Which are able, etc. —in contrast with all other writings. With the following important limitation, however, Through faith which is in Christ Jesus. These Scriptures, it will be observed, were those of the Old Testament, which could make wise only by teaching salvation through the Christ who was to come"—HOOKER.

16. All Scripture is inspired of God. "The Spirit of God not only once inspired those who wrote it, but continually inspires, supernaturally assists, those that read it with earnest prayer. Hence it is so profitable for doctrine, for instruction of the ignorant, for the reproof or conviction of them that are in error or sin, for the correction or amendment of whatever is amiss, and for instructing or training up the children of God in all righteousness"—WESLEY.

Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction, which is in righteousness (R.V.). The word Scripture is used fifty times in the New Testament, and is in all these places applied to the writings of the Old or New Testament, and to no other. It is clearly a technical word, and must have been so used and understood by S. Paul and by Timothy. Limited here by the context to the Scriptures which Timothy had learnt as a child, it can mean only the writings of the Old Testament; but when applied to the writings of the New Testament, as it is by S. Peter to the Epistles of S. Paul (2 Pet. 3. 15, 16), it of course carried with it, as belonging also to those books, all the attributes of inspiration, profitableness, and the like, which inhered in the word in its application to the Old Testament. Had S. Paul's Epistles not been inspired, and also profitable, S. Peter would not have classed them with "the other Scripture." Every Scripture, i.e. every passage or book of the Scriptures (which is the accurate rendering of S. Paul's words), is as extensive in meaning as "all Scripture," and more precise. Given by inspiration of God—lit. "God-breathed." (Comp. 2 Pet. 1. 21, "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.") The word does not enable us to establish or to give the preference to any of the theories of the mode of inspiration, but it does seem (as ELLICOTT says) "fairly either to assume or to enunciate this vital truth; that every separate portion of the Holy Book is inspired, and forms a living portion of a living and organic whole. While, on the one hand, this expression does not exclude such verbal errors, or, possibly, such trifling historical inaccuracies as man's spirit, even in its most exalted state, may not be wholly exempt from, and human transmission and transcription may have increased, it still does certainly assure us, on the other, that these writings, as we have them, are individually pervaded by God's Spirit, and warrants our belief that they are the true utterances of the Holy Ghost, and an assertion of the full inspiration of the Bible."

17. That the man of God—"he that is united to and approved of God. May be perfect—blameless himself, and throughly furnished—by the Scripture, either to teach, reprove, correct, or train up others"—WESLEY.

That the man of God may be perfect, throughly furnished unto all good works. "The 'man of God' here is no official designation, but simply designates the Christian generally, who is striving, with his Master's help, to live a life pleasing to God; and the 'good works' have no special reference to the labours of Timothy and his brother presbyters, but include all those generous and self-sacrificing acts to which in these Epistles so many references have been made. It was in the Holy Scriptures that the true servant of the Lord, the man of God, would find defined with clearness and precision the nature of those works the Holy Spirit was pleased to call 'good'"—C. B.

CHAPTER IV.

Vers. 1-8. CONTINUED EXHORTATION TO MINISTERIAL DILIGENCE.—1. I charge thee, therefore. "This is deduced from the whole preceding chapter. At His appearing and His kingdom—that is, at His appearing in the kingdom of glory"—WESLEY.

"Exhortation to faithful performance of official duty is strongly enforced, and the allusion to the last judgment gives special strength to the exhortation. I charge thee. Matters of greatest importance must be pressed with greatest vehemence. It is a weakness to be hot in a cold matter, but worse to be cold in a hot matter"—TRAPP.

2. Be instant—"insist on, urge these things in season, out of season—that is, continually, at all times and places. It might be translated, with and without opportunity—not only when a fair occasion is given: even when there is none, one must be made"—WESLEY.

Preach the word. "The language of the original here is abrupt and emphatic, written evidently under strong emotion and with intense earnestness. S. Paul charged his friend and successor with awful solemnity, as we have seen, 'preach,' or proclaim, loudly and publicly, as a herald would announce the accession of his king. Be instant—attentive and earnest. In season, out of season—take opportunity or make it. (Comp. Ezek. 2. 5, 'whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear.') The application of this precept would of course be prudentially modified by such cautions as Matt. 7. 6. Reprove, rebuke, exhort—rather, 'convict, rebuke,' etc., put, that is, to its various uses every scripture which God has inspired (ch. 3. 16)"—S. C. With all longsuffering and doctrine. The word translated "doctrine" signifies, rather, "teaching." He must reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all gentleness and patience; and in all this he must take care that "teaching"—the teaching which is right and true, and full of hope—accompanies his rebuke and his words of comfort.

3. For they will heap up teachers. "Therefore thou hast need of 'all longsuffering.' According to their own desires—smooth as they can wish. Having itching ears—fond of novelty and variety, which the number of new teachers, as well as their empty, soft, or philosophical discourses, pleased. Such teachers, and such hearers, seldom are much concerned with what is strict or to the purpose. Heap to themselves—not enduring sound doctrine, they will reject the sound preachers, and gather together all that suit their own taste. Probably they send out one another as teachers, and so are never at a loss for numbers"—WESLEY.

"Timothy must remember that things in the Church of Christ on earth will not change for the better. The great drag-net of the Church, in its wide sweep, would keep drawing into its meshes something of every kind. Errors now just apparent, he must bear in mind, would attain more formidable dimensions. The thirst for novelties in doctrine, the desire for a teaching which, while offering peace to a troubled conscience, would yet allow the old self-indulgent life to go on as before, would increase. In full view of this development of error, in sure expectation of a future full of anxious care, Timothy and his brother teachers must indeed be wakeful, watchful, and earnest in their preaching and ministrations"—ELLICOTT. And they shall turn away their ears from the truth. This was the punishment of those who would only listen to what was pleasing to them, and which flattered instead of reproved their way of life. They became involved in the many various errors in doctrine which were then taught in the schools of the heretics, and they ended by turning away from every Christian truth.

5. Watch—"an earnest, constant, persevering exercise. The Scripture watching, or waiting, implies steadfast faith, patient hope, labouring love, unceasing prayer; yea, the mighty exertion of all the affections of the soul that a man is capable of. In all things—whatever you are doing, yet in that, and 'in all things, watch.' Do the work of an evangelist—which was next to that of an apostle"—WESLEY.

But watch thou in all things. "'But do thou,' continued S. Paul, 'do thou be watchful.' The Greek word translated 'watch thou,' signifies literally 'be sober.' It has been well paraphrased, 'Keep thy coolness and presence of mind that thou be not entrapped into forgetfulness, but as one ever wakeful and ready, be on the watch.' The word, as it were, sums up all those last directions of S. Paul, from ch. 2. 14, in which S. Paul charged Timothy to abstain from vain arguments and confine himself to the simple word of truth, to avoid discussions which would be likely to lead to strife, and to be patient and gentle with all—to separate himself from merely nominal Christians, and to keep steadily to the old paths in which the apostles had walked. He was to be ever watchful in all these things"—SPENCE. The work of an evangelist. "The work of proclaiming the gospel (ch. 5. 2), which was still incumbent on Timothy in his higher position, and which, in fact, inheres, whatever else may be added to it, in every order of the ministry"—S. C.

6. The time of my departure is at hand—"so undoubtedly God had shown him. I am ready to be offered up—lit. 'to be poured out,' as the wine and oil were on the ancient sacrifices"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul points to his approaching death in order to strengthen his exhortation to Timothy to fulfil his duties faithfully. As he himself cannot any longer contend against the increasing disorder, Timothy must be all the more careful to prove himself faithful. S. Paul makes nothing of death. It was no more betwixt God and Moses but 'Go up and die.' So betwixt Christ and S. Paul, but launch out, and land immediately at the fair haven of heaven"—TRAPP.

8. The crown of that righteousness—"which God has imputed to me and wrought in me. Will render to all. This increases the joy of S. Paul, and encourages Timothy.

Many of these S. Paul himself had gained. That have loved His appearing—which only a real Christian can do. I say a real Christian, to comply with the mode of the times: else they would not understand, although the word Christian necessarily implies whatsoever is holy, as God is holy. Strictly speaking, to join real or sincere to a word of so complete an import, is grievously to debase its noble signification, and is like adding long to eternity or wide to immensity"—WESLEY.

A crown of righteousness—"the crown, that is, which shall be given for righteousness; as in the games, the crown of the race, the crown of wrestling, is the crown given to the victor in the race, or in wrestling, or the like. It is a criticism, based on ignorance of the facts of the inner life, which sees in this happy confidence of the apostle a contradiction to the humility of his other Epistles, e.g. Phil. 3. 12–14. Rather it is an evidence of the authenticity of this his latest Epistle, written when martyrdom was imminent. For it is a truth, proved by so many instances as almost to indicate a law of the procedure of the Divine grace, that the assurance which has been withheld from God's people in the midst of their ordinary duties and trials, is granted them in the hour of need, and especially at the approach of death. Nor is there any contradiction between the apostle's expectation of the crown of righteousness and his doctrine of free justification by faith. 'Rather,' says CALVIN, 'do these two rightly agree; that man is justified freely by the merits of Christ, and yet that he will receive the reward of works from before God. For as soon as God receives us into His favour, He holds our works also acceptable, so as to vouchsafe them a reward also, however undeserved"—S. C. "Who have loved and do love His appearing. That is the full force of the Greek, which expresses the present and permanent result of past action; and therein lies the test whereby to try the temper of our Christianity. S. Paul, who had long yearned to depart and be with Christ, could not easily have given a more simple or sure method of finding out who those are who have a right to believe that the Lord has a crown of righteousness in store for them. Are we among the number? Are our lives such that we are longing for Christ's return?"—PLUMMER.

9. Come to me—"both that he might comfort him, and be strengthened by him. Timotheus himself is said to have suffered at Ephesus"—WESLEY.

"He longed to see some of his faithful companions once more, and for the last time to bid them with his own mouth to be faithful and brave. So, as it were hoping against hope, he dictates on the last pages of the letter, Do thy diligence, or better, 'earnestly endeavour to come shortly to me.' His loving wish to see Timothy again appears from the words of ch. 1. 4, 'greatly desiring to see thee,' and again from ch. 4. 21, 'Do thy diligence to come before winter.' On the natural human longing for sympathy in the supreme hour, compare our blessed Lord's words to Peter, James, and John (Matt. 26. 38), 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch with Me'"—C. B.

10. Demas—"once my fellow-labourer (Philem. 24)—hath forsaken me. Crescens, probably a teacher also, is gone, with my consent, to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia, having now left Crete. These either went with him to Rome, or visited him there"—WESLEY.

Demas hath forsaken me, etc.—"rather, 'Demas left me because he loved the present world, and went to Thessalonica,' which was perhaps his home. He was with S. Paul at Rome during part, at least, of his first imprisonment, being mentioned as joining in greetings to the Colossians (Col. 4. 4), and in the Epistle to Philemon (ver. 24) he is numbered among the apostle's fellow-labourers. There is no scriptural ground for assuming that this shrinking from danger and duty, sinful though it was, was equivalent to, or ended in, total apostasy, which, however, was the later tradition mentioned by Epiphanius. Demas is perhaps a shortened form of Demetrius"—S. C.

11. Only Luke—"of my fellow-labourers, is with me. But God is with me; and it is enough. Take mark—who, though he once, 'departed from the work,' is now again profitable to me"—WESLEY.

Only Luke is with me—i.e. Luke alone of the apostle's usual companions in travel. Others were with him (ver. 23). There is no reason for doubting that this Luke was the apostle's well-known assistant. He accompanied S. Paul on his second missionary journey from Troas (Acts 16. 10), then on his third journey (Acts 20. 5–21; 28). He was with S. Paul both in his imprisonment at Cæsarea and in the first imprisonment at Rome (Acts 27; Col. 4. 14; Philem. 24).

12. "Tychicus was in Greece with S. Paul on the third missionary journey, and preceded him to Troas (Acts 20. 4, 5). According to Col. 4. 7 and Eph. 6. 21, S. Paul sent him from Rome to Asia Minor"—HUTHER.

13. The cloak—"either the 'toga,' which belonged to him as a Roman citizen, or an upper garment, which might be needful as winter came on—which I left at Troas with Carpus—who was probably his host there. Especially the parchments—the books written on parchment"—WESLEY.

"The cloak, etc. The apparently trivial nature of this request in an Epistle containing such weighty matter, and also the fact of such a wish on the part of one expecting death being made at all, is at first a little puzzling. It is best to understand the words as simply requesting Timothy, on his way, to bring with him a thick cloak, or mantle, which S. Paul had left with a certain Carpus at Troas. Probably, when he left it, it was summer, and he was disinclined to burden himself in his hurried journey with any superfluous things. Winter was now coming on, and the poor aged prisoner in the cold damp prison, with few friends and scanty resources, remembered and wished for his cloak. It is just such a request which the master would make of his disciple, who, knowing well the old man's frail, shattered health, would never be surprised at such a request even in an Epistle so solemn. And the books. The books were, most likely, a few choice works, some bearing on Jewish sacred history, partly exegetical and explanatory of the mysterious senses veiled under the letter of the Law and the Prophets, and partly historical. Others were probably heathen writings, of which we know, from his many references in his Epistle, S. Paul was a diligent student"—ELLICOTT.

14, 15. The Lord will reward him. "This he spoke prophetically"—WESLEY.

"The words do not imply any desire for vengeance: Christian love does not extinguish the feeling of justice; besides the apostle does not speak the words because of the personal injury, but because of Alexander's hostility to the truth"—MEYER.

16. All—"my friends and companions—forsook me. And do we expect to find such as will not forsake us? My first defence—before the savage Emperor Nero"—WESLEY.

Surely this was S. Paul's saddest experience. His enemies had persecuted him, out of hatred to the cause of Christ, but to be forsaken by his own familiar friends, at his great public trial, was still harder to bear.

17. The preaching—"the gospel which we preach"—WESLEY.

Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me. Though men deserted Him, yet One—even his Lord (Christ), who could do more for him than any friend or advocate or protector of earth—stood by him, and strengthened him by giving him courage and readiness. The word for "strengthen" means literally "to infuse power into" a person. It is one of which the apostle is rather fond; and outside his writings it occurs in the New Testament only in the Acts and in Hebrews, once in each. (Rom. 4. 20; Eph. 6. 10; Phil. 4. 13; 1 Tim. 1. 12; ch. 2. 1.)

18. And the Lord will deliver me from every evil work—"which is far more than delivering me from death. Yea, and, over and above, preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom—far better than that of Nero"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul's enemies are not likely to be idle during the extension of time granted by the court. They will do their utmost to secure a sentence of condemnation at the second hearing of the case, and thus get the man whom they detest removed from the earth. Whether they will succeed or not, the apostle does not know. But one thing he knows:—that whatever is really evil in their works against him will be powerless to harm him. The Lord will turn evil into good. They may succeed in compassing his death. But, even if they do so, the Lord will make their work of death a work of salvation; and by the severing of the thread which still binds S. Paul to this life will save him unto, that is, 'will translate him safe into' His heavenly kingdom"—PLUMMER.

20. When I came on, Erastus abode at Corinth — "being chamberlain of the city (Rom. 16. 23). But Trophimus I have left sick, not having power (as neither had any of the apostles) to work miracles when he pleased, but only when God pleased"—WESLEY.

But Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick. Trophimus, a Gentile Christian, who was with S. Paul on his third missionary journey, and whom the apostle was accused of taking into the Temple at Jerusalem. It was this accusation on the part of the Jews which led to S. Paul's arrest which preceded his first long imprisonment. The event here alluded to must have taken place some time after the apostle's release from the first imprisonment, A.D. 63, and, probably, in the course of his last journey, shortly before his second arrest and imprisonment at Rome, about A.D. 66.

21. Do thy diligence to come before winter. "Probably this was added to hasten his coming. If he delayed, the season of the year would put off, perhaps hinder altogether, his voyage. Eubulus greeteth thee. Of this Eubulus nothing is known. And Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia. Of these, Linus was, no doubt, the first of the long line of Bishops of Rome. The date of his consecration corresponds with the year of S. Paul's martyrdom, A.D. 66. We know, from this greeting, he was one of the few 'faithful' to his old master"—WESLEY.

22. "The salutation is twofold—to Timothy and to his flock. The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you (all). The subscription, though in this instance probably correct, has no authority"—S. C.

THE EPISTLE TO TITUS.

"TITUS was converted from heathenism by S. Paul (Gal. 2. 3); and, as it seems, very early; since the apostle accounted him as his brother at his first going into Macedonia: and he managed and settled the churches there, when S. Paul thought not good to go thither himself. He had now left him at Crete, to regulate the churches; to assist him wherein, he wrote this Epistle, as is generally believed, after the First, and before the Second, to Timothy. The tenor and style are much alike in this and in those; and they cast much light on each other, and are worthy the serious attention of all Christian ministers and churches in all ages.

"THIS EPISTLE HAS FOUR PARTS—

I. The Inscription,	Chap. i. 1-4.
II. The Instruction of Titus to this effect—
1. Ordain good Presbyters,	,, ,, 5-9.
2. Such are especially needful at Crete,	,, ,, 10-12.
3. Reprove and admonish the Cretans,	,, ,, 13-16.
4. Teach aged men and women,	,, ii. 1-5.
And young men, being a pattern to them,	,, ,, 6-8.
And servants, urging them by a glorious motive,	,, ,, 9-15.
5. Press obedience to Magistrates, and gentleness to all men,	,, iii. 1-2.
Enforcing it by the same motive,	,, ,, 3-7.
6. Good works are to be done, foolish questions avoided, heretics shunned,	,, ,, 8-11.
III. An Invitation of Titus to Nicopolis, with some admonitions,	,, ,, 12-14.
IV. The Conclusion,	,, ,, 15."

CHAPTER I.

1. Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ—"titles suitable to the person of S. Paul, and the office he was assigning to Titus. According to the faith—the propagating of which is the proper business of an apostle. A servant of God—according to the faith of the elect. An apostle of Jesus Christ—according to the knowledge of the truth. We serve God according to the measure of our faith; we fulfil our public office according to the measure of our knowledge. The truth that is after godliness—which in every point runs parallel with and supports the vital, spiritual worship of God; and, indeed, has no other end or scope. These two verses contain the sum of Christianity, which Titus was always to have in his eye. Of the elect of God—of all real Christians"—WESLEY.

Paul, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ. "The titles here assumed by S. Paul in his introductory greeting are in some respects slightly different to any of his usual designations. In the other two so-called Pastoral Epistles addressed to Timothy, S. Paul simply styles himself, 'an apostle of Jesus Christ.' Possibly, the longer and more formal title is here adopted because his relations were hardly ever of so intimate a character with Titus as with Timothy; the latter would seem to have held the position of S. Paul's adopted son. According to the faith of God's elect. The rendering should be, 'for (the furtherance of) the faith,' or, in other words, 'the object of my (Paul's) apostleship was that through my instrumentality the chosen of God should believe.' The whole question respecting these 'elect,' or 'chosen of God,' is surrounded with deep mystery; three or four guiding thoughts may however, be safely laid down:—(1) In the visible world such an apparently arbitrary election to special privileges, fortune, happiness, utterly irrespective, in the first instance, of individual merit, does exist. This is clear to all of us. (2) In grace we are distinctly told repeatedly that a similar election exists, and our own observation certainly coincides here with revelation. (3) Such election in no case seemingly affects our position here as free agents; surrounded with the most precious privileges, gifted with much knowledge, it is possible, as we, alas, too often see, deliberately to refuse the good and to choose the evil. (4) All such allusions to the 'elect' as, for instance, the one here before us, are intended, not as a stumbling-block for the believer, but as a comfort for the faithful, struggling man of God, for it tells him how the Eternal 'before the ages' had chosen him to be His servant"—SPENCE.

2. In hope of eternal life—"the grand motive and encouragement of every apostle and every servant of God. Which God promised before the world began—to Christ, our Head"—WESLEY.

Better translated, resting on the hope of eternal life. The connection of the preceding clauses with these words has been well summed up, "The apostle's calling had for its object the faith of the elect and the knowledge of the truth; and the basis on which all this rested was the hope of eternal life." Which God, that cannot lie—possibly this singular and strong expression was chosen with reference to the peculiar vice of the Cretans, over whose church Titus was then presiding. (See ver. 12.) Promised before the world began—more accurately, "from eternal ages." (See 2 Tim. 1. 9.) The promise of eternal life was the result of a Divine purpose fixed from eternity.

3. And He hath in His own times—"at sundry times; and 'His own times' are fittest for His own work. What creature dares ask, 'Why no sooner?' Manifested His word—containing that promise, and the whole 'truth which is after godliness.' Through the preaching wherewith I am intrusted, according to the commandment of God our Saviour—and who dares exercise this office on any less authority?"—WESLEY.

"The preaching intrusted to me"—MEYER. S. Paul had some reason for describing his preaching as the means by which this revelation was made, since he recognised the depth of the Divine decree as no other apostle had recognised it, and by him it was proclaimed to all peoples. (See 2 Tim. 4. 17.)

4. My own son—"begot in the same image of God, and repaying a paternal with a filial affection. The common faith—common to me and all my spiritual children"—WESLEY.

To Titus. "We know comparatively little of Titus' early career. In the Acts he, singularly enough, is never mentioned; for what knowledge of him we possess we are entirely dependent upon a few casual allusions to him in the Epistles. This presbyter in charge of the Cretan church was a Greek, the son of Gentile parents, and uncircumcised. He owed his conversion to Christianity to S. Paul, with whom ever after he seems to have been connected by ties of intimate friendship, though he was by no means the apostle's constant companion, as was Timothy or Silas or Luke. Only during the apostle's long residence at Ephesus (nearly three years) Titus appears to have been, for at least part of the time, closely associated with S. Paul, and his confidant in his complicated relations with foreign churches. It is clear that during this long Ephesian residence he was drawn into close and intimate friendship with S. Paul, who then had opportunity of becoming acquainted with Titus' varied powers and evident skill in the administration and in dealing with men and women. From the several casual notices in the Second Corinthian Epistle, we gather considerable insight into the character and powers of the Gentile convert. Amongst other works, he apparently completed the collection S. Paul had set on foot in the various Gentile churches for the poor Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. His services, assisting materially to bring this famous work of charity to a successful issue, seem not to have been the least among his titles to S. Paul's friendship and high esteem"—SPENCE.

5. The things which are wanting—"which I had not time to settle myself. Ordain elders—appoint the most faithful, zealous men to watch over the rest. Their character follows (vers. 6–9). These were the 'elders,' or 'bishops,' that S. Paul approved of;—men that had living faith, a pure conscience, a blameless life"—WESLEY.

Appoint elders in every city. This implies that among the multitude of cities, for which Crete in Homer's day had been already famous, not a few had a Christian congregation which needed this oversight and instruction. S. Paul tells Titus to take care that no city is left without a presbyter. Each Christian community is to have its proper ministry; it is not to be left to its own guidance. There were many things that were wanting in Crete; but one of the chief things which pressed upon the apostle's mind was the lack of a properly organised ministry, without which everything must soon fall into confusion and decay. S. Paul himself had done something, but in many respects the churches were not organised as they ought to be; presbyters had still to be appointed to gather single believers into a firmly established church.

6. The husband of one wife—"surely the Holy Ghost, by repeating this so often, designed to leave the Romanists without excuse"—WESLEY.

If any be blameless. The candidate for the holy office must have naught laid to his charge; he must be of such a character that no one could bring a reasonable accusation against him. Blameless must be his life, spotless his name. As it has been well said, "the office of presbyter must never be allowed to cover or condone damaged reputations."

Having faithful children—better, "believing children." In searching out these presbyters, whose charge would involve so many and such responsible duties, Titus must look for men of ripe age. There were even grave objections to the appointment of the comparatively young to this office. Not accused of riot—more accurately rendered, "dissoluteness." The Greek word here rendered "riot" implies a self-indulgent or even a reckless expenditure. Such careless selfishness well-nigh always ends in profligacy. In the case of men whose duties included the superintendence of the Church's funds, it was imperatively necessary that their homes and families should be free from all suspicion of anything like that reckless waste or extravagance which in so many cases imperceptibly passes into dissoluteness and profligacy. Riot. The word includes the notions of extravagance and of indulgence in vicious pleasure.

7. As the steward of God—"to whom He intrusts immortal souls. Not selfwilled—lit. 'pleasing himself'; but all men for their good to edification. Not passionate—but mild, yielding, tender"—WESLEY.

It is the moral estimation in which the person to be selected was held, the reputation which he had amongst men, on which above all he lays stress. For an efficient discharge of the duties of the office can be conceived of only on the supposition of a good reputation. PLUMMER says: "God's steward must be ready to sink every personal interest in the interests of the great Employer. He has nothing of his own. He deals with his Master's goods, and must deal with them in his Master's way. He who labours in this spirit will one day be rewarded by the Divine voice of welcome, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.'"

9. As he hath been taught—"perhaps it might be more literally rendered, according to the teaching, or doctrine, of the apostles; alluding to Acts 2. 42"—WESLEY.

Holding fast, etc.—i.e. "keeping close to the doctrine of Christ, 'the word of His grace,' adhering thereto according to the instructions he hath received, holding it fast in his own belief and profession, and in teaching others. 'I have kept the faith' was S. Paul's comfort (2 Tim. 4. 7), and 'not shunned to declare . . . the whole counsel of God' (Acts 20. 27); there was his faithfulness"—HENRY.

10. They of the circumcision—"the Jewish converts"—WESLEY.

Vain talkers—"who must say something, and who have broken the peace of many a home and shattered the prosperity of many a church; the multitude of teachers who have nothing true to say is the curse of the kingdom of God"—REYNOLDS.

11. Stopped. "The word properly means, to 'put a bit into the mouth' of an unruly horse"—WESLEY.

"For an example how Titus and his presbyters were to stop the mouths of these teachers of what was false, comp. Matt. 22. 34–46, where the Lord, by His wise, powerful, yet gentle words, first put the Sadducees to silence, and then so answered the Pharisees that 'neither durst any man, from that day forth, ask Him any more questions.' Teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake. Here S. Paul goes to the root of the evil, when he shows what was the end and aim of these 'teachers'' lives. It was a mean and sordid ambition, after all—merely base gain. When this is the main object of a religious teacher's life, his teaching naturally accommodates itself to men's tastes. He forgets the Divine Giver of his commission, and in his thirst for the popularity which brings with it gold, his true work, as the faithful watchman of the house of Israel, is forgotten and ignored"—SPENCE.

12. A prophet—"so all poets were anciently called; but besides Diogenes Laertius says that Epimenides, the Cretan poet, foretold many things. Evil wild beasts—fierce and savage"—WESLEY.

One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said. S. Paul had spoken (vers. 10, 11) in the severest terms of certain influential members of the Cretan church; he had even alluded to their disastrous teaching ruining whole families, evidently implying that he had perceived among the Cretans a readiness to welcome a teaching which countenanced a laxer moral tone, the invariable result of perverted doctrine; and now he supports his own condemning words by a reference to a well-known Cretan poet—to one who, according to tradition, was even honoured by them as a god. Slow bellies—these terms paint with sharp accuracy other evil characteristics of the Cretan peoples—their dull gluttony, their slothful sensuality. The words are used especially of those who, by indulging their bodily appetites, become corpulent and indolent.

13. "Reprove sharply—the word is 'cuttingly.' He that minds his patient's health will not trifle with his mortal diseases. Reproof is an edged tool, and must not be jested with. He that reproves sin merrily, as one that takes a pride to show his wit and to make the company laugh, will destroy the sinner instead of the sin"—SWINNOCK.

14. Commandments of men—"the Jewish or other teachers, whoever they were that turned from the truth"—WESLEY.

We gather the nature of these commandments from the words of the next (15th) verse. They related to the abstinence from meats and from other things created by God for the use and enjoyment of man.

15, 16. To the pure—"those whose hearts are purified by faith—this we allow. All things are pure—all kinds of meat; the Mosaic distinction between clean and unclean meats being now taken away. But to the defiled and unbelieving nothing is pure—the apostle joins 'defiled' and 'unbelieving,' to intimate that nothing can be clean without true faith: for both the understanding and conscience, those leading powers of the soul, are polluted; consequently, so is the man and all he does"—WESLEY.

Unto the pure, etc. All things, that is, to which the distinction of clean and unclean has been applied. (Comp. Rom. 14. 14, and 1 Cor. 8. 4–8.) Moral impurity is, of course, not in question. Besides the difference of meats, we have other instances of ceremonial distinctions given in Mark 7. 4–8. The spirit of this saying of S. Paul, occurring almost in the same language as in Rom. 14. 20, was the groundwork of much of the Gentile apostle's teaching. The words of the Lord Jesus above referred to (Matt. 15. 2, 11) contains the same grand truth. All things include much besides mere food—in a word, include all acts connected with everyday life which in themselves are neither right nor wrong, neither good nor evil, but which derive their colouring of good or evil solely from the doer of the act. Them that are defiled, etc. "Practical unbelief is only too commonly allied with moral pollution"—ELLICOTT. "Defilement of the mind means that the thoughts, wishes, purposes, activities are all stained and debased. The second of these—the conscience—is the moral consciousness within, that which is ever bringing up the memory of the past, with its omissions and commissions, its errors, its cruel, heartless unkindness, its selfish disregard of others. When this is defiled, then the last safeguard of the soul is broken down. The man and woman of the defiled conscience is self-satisfied, hard, impenitent to the last"—SPENCE. They profess, etc. "Probably they laid claim to a higher degree of knowledge, and the terms Gnosis 'knowledge' and Gnostic might already be beginning to be used arrogantly by teachers"—S. C.

CHAPTER II.

1. Wholesome—"restoring and preserving spiritual health"—WESLEY.

"It will be observed that the sound teaching which Titus is charged to give to the different sections of his flock relates almost exclusively to conduct. There is scarcely a hint in the whole of this chapter that can be supposed to have reference to errors of doctrine. In quite a general way the old men are to be exhorted to be sound in faith as well as in love and patience: but otherwise all the instruction to be given to old and young, bond and free, relates to conduct in thought, word, and deed"—PLUMMER.

2. Vigilant—"as veteran soldiers, not easily to be surprised. Patience—a virtue particularly needful for and becoming them. Serious—not drolling or diverting on the brink of eternity"—WESLEY.

Aged men—"the correct rendering, not 'presbyters.' Age, not office, is here designated. Temperate—self-restrained in all things, not merely in meat and drink. In patience. S. Chrysostom observes that patience is substituted for hope, as the third grace with faith and charity, as being especially the virtue of old men"—S. C.

3. In behaviour—"the particulars whereof follow—as becometh holiness—lit. 'observing an holy decorum.' Not slanderers—or evil-speakers. Not given to much wine—if they use a little for their often infirmities. Teachers—age and experience call them so to be. Let them teach good only"—WESLEY.

"Behaviour—'demeanour,' outward deportment, in manner, habits, dress, etc., which indicates the inward principle. False accusers—slanderers (1 Tim. 3. 11). Not given to much wine—lit. not 'enslaved by much wine'; according to Plato, a besetting sin of the Cretans"—S. C. The aged women likewise. "S. Paul, faithful to what had now become one of the guiding principles of Christianity, the equal position of women in the city of God, fellow-heirs with men in the citizenship of the city which hath foundations, proceeds to remind the elder women of Crete of their own high duties in the company of believers. They now—the women—must remember that the position which Christ and His disciples had claimed for them in the world was not without its grave responsibilities. These aged women of the flock, like the elders just exhorted, had also much to do for Christ. That they be in behaviour as becometh holiness—that is, 'that they should show themselves as it becometh holiness'; or, more literally, 'in demeanour reverend.' The Greek word rendered 'in behaviour,' or 'in demeanour,' includes dress, appearance, conversation, manner; includes an outward deportment dependent on something more internal"—SPENCE.

4. That they instruct the young women. "These Timothy was to instruct himself—Titus, by the elder women—to love their husbands, their children—with a tender, temperate, holy, wise affection. O how hard a lesson!"—WESLEY.

"That it was natural for the young to imitate the old will be readily allowed; it was therefore necessary that the old should be an example of godly living to the young"—CLARKE. "In Ephesus the representative of the apostle was directed himself to exhort the younger women; very likely the same charge being given here to the aged women of the congregations was owing to the state of the Cretan Christians, which called not only for more practical and homely, but also for more individual, exhortations. So here this special work was left for the elder women among the faithful to carry out. Such a reformation not only in the discipline of the church, but also in the individual life and conversation, as S. Paul desired to see in Crete, would never be brought about by a sermon, or even by many sermons, however eloquent and earnest, from Titus. It would be a matter requiring long time and patience, and would rather follow as the result of patient individual effort and holy example"—ELLICOTT.

5. Discreet—"particularly in the love of their children. Chaste—particularly in the love of their husbands. Keepers at home—whenever they are not called out by works of necessity, piety, and mercy. Good—well-tempered, sweet, soft, obliging. Obedient to their husbands—whose will, in all things lawful, is a rule to the wife. That the word of God be not blasphemed—or evil spoken of; particularly by unbelieving husbands, who lay all the blame on the religion of their wives"—WESLEY.

Keepers at home. "Home duties, cares, pleasures, sacrifices of self—these God-appointed duties ought to fill the mind and the heart of the young wife. There should be no desire, no attempt, to go round to the other houses, and so contracting idle, gossiping habits. Obedient to their own husbands—more accurately, 'submitting themselves to their own husbands.' Women who really love their Master, Christ, should take care that, as far as in them lay, the law of subordination in the family to its rightful head should be strictly carried out. In a church like that of Crete, made out of divided houses often, where the Christian wife was married to a pagan husband, such a charge as this was specially needful"—ELLICOTT.

6. To be discreet—"a virtue rarely found in youth"—WESLEY.

Sober-minded. "The frequent occurrence of this precept—four times in six verses—may be explained by the character of the Cretans given in ch. 1. 12, 13"—S. C. Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded. "The task of influencing the young men belongs especially to Titus. Among them, in respect to age, he still must be reckoned; as regarded their peculiar temptations, none could be found so fit as the still young Christian disciple of S. Paul (he was probably about forty years of age when he was placed over the Cretan church) to set out vividly before them both the peril and the only means of guarding against it. In this word (sober-minded) which urged self-restraint, a young man's duty is briefly comprehended. No task, S. Chrysostom tells us, is after all so hard and difficult for youth, as obtaining the mastery over oneself in the matter of harmful pleasures. The apostle gives but few special directions here for his disciples' guidance, for he is going to tell him how he will best win these young men to the side of Christ. It will be, he proceeds to show him, most effectually done by the sight of the example of his own manly, self-restrained religious life"—SPENCE.

7. Showing thyself a pattern. "Titus himself was then young. In the doctrine which thou teachest in public: as to matter, uncorruptness; as to the manner of delivering it, seriousness—weightiness, solemnity"—WESLEY.

The exhortation by word is to be accompanied by the exhortation of example; in regard to all things, in all points. The form of the doctrine which Titus preaches is to be pure, chaste, free from everything that conflicts with the nature of the gospel. All false doctrines leave men under the influence of spiritual disease.

8. Wholesome speech—"in private conversation"—WESLEY.

"Discourses—i.e. not only sound in doctrine for the instruction of the church, but so well considered and judiciously applied as to give no undue advantage to opponents"—S. C. These warnings of S. Paul belong to all ages of the faith.

9. Please them in all things—"wherein it can be done without sin. Not answering again—though blamed unjustly. This honest servants are most apt to do. Not stealing—not taking or giving anything without their master's leave—this fair-spoken servants are apt to do"—WESLEY.

Exhortation in regard to slaves. The harder the lot of the slaves, and the more unendurable this might appear to the Christian slave, conscious of his Christian dignity, the more necessary was it to impress upon him the duty of faithful obedience. Not answering again—i.e. they must obey cheerfully, willingly, without sullenness; not thwarting or setting themselves against their master's plans or desires or orders; and the apostle (in ver. 10) gives them a noble inducement for this brave, sweet patience he would have so earnestly pressed upon them. Such conduct on their part, he tells them, would serve greatly to help the Master's cause; it would prepossess many hostile minds in favour of a religion which could so powerfully influence even the slave. S. CHRYSOSTOM comments thus: "Greeks form their estimate of doctrines not from the doctrine itself, but from the actions and the life" (of those who profess the doctrine).

10. Showing all good fidelity—"soft, obliging faithfulness. That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour—more than S. Paul says of kings. How he raises the lowness of his subject! So may they, the lowness of their condition"—WESLEY.

Showing all good fidelity—i.e. not a service merely which aims at good appearances, but which arises from good principle. (Comp. Eph. 6. 5; Col. 3. 22.) Not purloining, but showing all good fidelity. "It must be remembered that many of the slaves in the Roman empire were employed in other duties besides those connected with the house or on the farm. Some were intrusted with shops, and these being left often quite to themselves, of course great opportunities for dishonesty and fraud were constantly present. Others received an elaborate training, and as artists, or even physicians, worked in part for their masters. A slave in the days of S. Paul had a hundred ways of showing to his owner this true and genuine fidelity, opposed to mere assumed surface obedience and service. That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. A slave cheerfully accepting his hard yoke, and striving with hand and brain to please and advance the interest of his earthly master, only for the dear love of Christ, must have been in those days of cynical self-love a silent, yet a most powerful preacher of a gospel which could so mould and elevate a character so degraded"—SPENCE. It is noteworthy how God deigns to receive an adornment from slaves, whose condition was so mean and abject that scarcely were they considered to rank among men at all: "they were ranked as 'possessions,' just like cattle or horses"—CALVIN. "This teaching of S. Paul is in harmony with the words of the Lord Jesus, 'Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise.' God gets His highest praise from the lips of little children, His robes of glory from the faithfulness, honour, and simplicity of born slaves"—REYNOLDS.

11. The saving grace of God—"so it is in its nature, tendency, and design—hath appeared to all men—high and low"—WESLEY.

The expression bringing salvation to all men, is another of those hard sayings which have been pressed into the service of that kindly but erring school of expositors which shuts its eyes to the contemplation of the many unmistakable sayings which warn the impenitent and hardened sinner of the sad doom of eternal death. The grace alone brings salvation to all men—in other words, it is that grace of God whereby alone it is possible for mankind to be saved. The expression by no means asserts that all men will be saved by it, but that it is the only means by which salvation is possible.

12. Instructing us—"all who do not reject it—that, having renounced ungodliness—whatever is contrary to the fear and love of God. And worldly desires—which are opposite to sobriety and righteousness. We should live soberly—in all purity and holiness. 'Sobriety,' in the Scripture sense, is rather the whole temper of a man, than a single virtue in him. It comprehends all that is opposite to the drowsiness of sin, the folly of ignorance, the unholiness of disorderly passions. Sobriety is no less than all the powers of the soul being consistently and constantly awake, duly governed by heavenly prudence, and entirely conformable to holy affections. And righteously—doing to all as we would they should do to us. And godly—as they who are consecrated to God both in heart and life"—WESLEY.

"Teaching us—lit. 'disciplining us'; educating us by life's sad experiences. God's grace is in truth a stern discipline of self-denial and training for higher things. Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts. More accurately, 'to the intent that, having denied,' etc. The object of the loving discipline of our Father in heaven is that we, having done with those things in life which are offensive or dishonourable to God, having put aside as worthless all inordinate desires for the things of this world—all those things which exclusively belong to this life and have nothing to do with the life to come—having denied all this, that we should live as righteous men the remainder of our lives here"—SPENCE. "To live soberly is to have every temper, appetite, and desire, under the government of reason, and reason itself under the government of the Spirit of God"—CLARKE. "This gospel revelation is to teach, and not by way of information only, but by way of precept and command, as a sovereign that gives laws to his subjects. It directs what to follow, and what to avoid, and what to do. The gospel is not for speculation only or chiefly, but for practice and right ordering of life"—M. HENRY.

13. Looking—"with eager desire—for that glorious appearing—which we hope for—of the great God even our Saviour Jesus Christ—so that, if there be (according to the Arian scheme) a great God and a little God, Christ is not the little God, but the great one"—WESLEY.

"Looking for the blessed hope and manifestation of the glory. And that holy life, just urged on the believer, of quiet self-restraint, of love to others, of piety towards God, must be lit up by a blessed hope, by a hope which is far more than a hope; that holy life of the faithful must be a continued waiting for a blessed hope—'the hope which is laid up for us in heaven' (Col. 1. 5). It may be asked, What is this hope? We answer, it is 'the hope of glory' which we shall share with the Son of God, when we behold Him as He is. So for us the hope of glory is intimately bound up with the second coming of the Lord. Then the life of the lover of the Lord must be one continued looking for, waiting for, the coming of the Lord in glory—must be a looking for that hour when we shall see, in all His Divine majesty, Him who redeemed us. In that life and light, in that majesty and glory, His own will share. Of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ. From the English version, it would seem that S. Paul's idea was that the Christian should live waiting for the glorious appearing of the great God, accompanied with our Lord Jesus Christ. In this sublime passage the glory of the Only-begotten Son alone finds mention. Taken thus, it is a studied declaration of the divinity of the Eternal Son, who is here styled 'our great God and Saviour'"—SPENCE.

14. Who gave Himself for us—"to die in our stead—that He might redeem us—miserable bond-slaves, as well from the power and the very being, as from the guilt, of all our sins"—WESLEY.

Himself is emphatic—"His whole self, soul and body, and all He had or was; Himself, God-Man, which was certainly the greatest gift that was ever given, the highest price that was ever paid for anything in the world"—BEVERIDGE. For us—both for our benefit and salvation. That He might redeem us—by the ransom of His own blood—from all iniquity, which was holding us in bondage (John 8. 34). The other idea contained in "redemption," the setting free from condemnation, is found in Eph. 1. 7. A peculiar people. (See 1 Pet. 2. 9.) "The word peculiar meaning originally 'what remains, over and above,' and 'so set apart as such,' came to signify 'separate from,' with, perhaps, occasionally the additional notion of 'superior to.' The title 'a peculiar people,' which belongs to the Jewish Church under the old covenant, is transferred by S. Peter and S. Paul to the Christian Church under the new. The differentia, however, and marks of separation under the gospel, is zeal for good works"—S. C. Who gave Himself for us. (See Gal. 1. 4; Eph. 5. 25.) These words take up the thought expressed in the term "Saviour" of the last verse. "Himself," His whole self, as has been well said, "the greatest gift ever given"; "for us," that is, on our behalf. That He might redeem us from all iniquity. That He for us might pay a ransom, the ransom being His precious blood. Our Saviour, by the payment of this tremendous ransom—O deepest and most unfathomable of all mysteries!—releases us from everything which is opposed to God's blessed will. Here the mighty ransom is spoken of as freeing us from the bondage of lawlessness; elsewhere in the Divine books the same ransom is described as delivering us from the penalties of this same breaking the Divine law"—HOFMANN.

15. Let no man despise thee—"that is, let none have any just cause to despise thee. Yet they surely will. Men who know not God will despise a true minister of His word"—WESLEY.

Exhort the faithful, and reprove the disobedient and careless. Let no man despise thee—"not here as 1 Tim. 4. 12, on account of 'thy youth'; but do this with such gravity, earnestness, and consistency of conduct, that no one shall have any ground for slighting thy admonitions. Speak so as to command respect"—S. C. CLARKE says: "Few portions of the New Testament excel this chapter. It may well form the creed, system of ethics, and text-book of every Christian preacher. Does any man inquire, What is the duty of a gospel minister? Send him to the second chapter of the Epistle to Titus for a complete answer. There he will find what he is to believe, what he is to practise, and what he is to preach."

CHAPTER III

1. Remind them—"all the Cretan Christians—to be subject—passively, not resisting—to principalities—supreme—and powers—subordinate governors. And to obey—them actively, so far as conscience permits"—WESLEY.

Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers. Very careful and searching have been the apostle's charges to Titus respecting the teachers of the Church, their doctrine and their life; very particular have been his directions, his warnings, and exhortations to men and women of different ages on the subject of their home life. But, with the exception of a slight digression in the case of slave to a pagan master, his words had been written with a reference generally to Christian life among Christians. But there was then a great life outside the little Christian world. How were the people of Christ to regulate their behaviour in their dealings with the vast pagan world outside? S. Paul goes to the root of the matter at once when he says, "Put them in mind," etc. The Greek words translated "principalities and powers" are better rendered here by "rulers and authorities," as the word "principalities" is used occasionally in the English version for an "order of angels." The terms include all constituted governors and officials, Roman and otherwise, in the island. To obey magistrates—taken absolutely, "to obey the temporal power." Our Lord's words were the model for all teaching in this division of Christian ethics. One great teacher after the other, in the same spirit, in varied language, urges upon the people of Christ a reverence and submission to all legally constituted authority in the State.

2. To speak evil—"neither of them nor any man. Not to be quarrelsome—to assault none. To be gentle—when assaulted—towards all men—even those who are such as we were"—WESLEY.

"These commands of S. Paul to the church of Crete breathe throughout the Spirit of Christ, who 'when He was reviled, reviled not again'; who said, 'Love your enemies, . . . do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.' The things charged here by S. Paul were new virtues to men. They are held up to admiration by no heathen moralists. The meekness signifies kindly forbearance. This Christian feeling, which looks lovingly on all sorts and conditions of men, on the stranger and the outcast, even on the vilest sinner, is especially enjoined here. It is the same sweet spirit of love which desires, in 1 Tim. 2. 1, that prayer and supplication be made in the public Christian assembly for all men"—ELLICOTT.

3. For we. "And as God hath dealt with us, so ought we to deal with our neighbour — were without understanding — wholly ignorant of God—and disobedient—when He was declared to us"—WESLEY.

"The meaning is, As we were in the state in which they are now, but were rescued by the kindness of God, it becomes us to show kindness and gentleness towards those whom we were at one time like"—MEYER.

4. When the love of God appeared—"by the light of His Spirit to our inmost soul"—WESLEY.

Another thought now wells up in the apostle's mind. We of ourselves should never have become changed men, had not the kindness of God and His Divine love for men shown itself. We, indeed, have no ground for self-exaltation, no excuse for haughty treatment of others, either in thought or action; for if we now live other and purer lives than they live, our change to better and higher things was owing to no desert or merit of ours, but solely to the mercy and the love of God.

5. Not by works. "In this important passage the apostle presents us with a delightful view of our redemption. Herein we have —(1) The cause of it; not our 'works' or righteousness, but 'the kindness and love of God our Saviour.' (2) The effects; which are (a) Justification; 'being justified,' pardoned and accepted through the alone merits of Christ, not from any desert in us, but according to His own mercy, 'by His grace,' His free unmerited goodness. (b) Sanctification, expressed by the laver of regeneration (that is, baptism, the thing signified, as well as the outward sign), and the renewal of the Holy Ghost, which purifies the soul, as water cleanses the body, and renews it in the whole image of God. (3) The consummation of all—that we might become heirs of eternal life, and live now in the joyful hope of it"—WESLEY.

"In this passage, which is a brief but pregnant epitome of the gospel, the scheme of man's salvation is regarded only from the side on which it is wholly God's work, without taking note of the conditions and qualifications which, however much they too are God's work, are required from the co-operation of man. The apostle was dwelling on the truth that the change referred to in ver. 3 is not due to ourselves or our own merit, but to God's grace. He therefore had no occasion to allude here to the qualifications or stipulations required at baptism, nor to the faith by which man is justified, nor to 'the working out his own salvation,' which is one of the instruments by which the Holy Ghost renews us day by day, nor to the holiness which is the character and badge of the heirs of eternal life. All this is needed: but, viewed from God's side, it is not by anything which man has done or could do, but by His own free mercy that God has saved him"—WACE. Not by works of righteousness. This by no means asserts that such works ever had been done, and then produced, as it were, before the bar of God, and weighed and found insufficient; but it simply maintains that to win salvation such must be done. Sad experience, more forcibly than any theological assertion, has demonstrated to us all the utter impossibility of any of us, even the holiest, ever, even for one day, doing the works of a purely righteous man.

7. That being justified by His grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. "Here appears the glorious design of God's salvation. We were in a hopeless and lost state, from which God's love for man saved us by the laver of regeneration and renovation; and this was the end for which He saved us—that we should be 'heirs of eternal life.' 'Being justified,' that is, freed from the future punishment and consequences of sin, and received into the favour and friendship of God, which favour and friendship had been, through sin, forfeited. 'By His grace,' by the favour and kindness of God the Father, are we restored to His love and friendship. 'Heirs' (see Rom. 8. 17, where this thought of our heirship of heaven is enlarged). 'According to the hope of eternal life': this life eternal is still for us in the future, though ever present in respect of hope: children of God we indeed are, and sharers in many a good gift of our Father, but eternal life, that glorious inheritance, is still in the far future, and as yet can only be enjoyed by us in hope, but it is a sure hope—eternal life—the hope of which is the mainspring of all Christian work and activity—though it includes it, of course, is something far more than merely endless existence. A veil, impenetrable to mortal eye, hangs between us and the many mansions of the Father's house. 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be,' we only know that then, we, in company with an innumerable host of blessed beings, shall share in the beatific vision; we only know that then 'we shall ever be with the Lord'; and that with this thought and with these words are we to 'comfort one another.' (See 1 Thess. 4. 17, 18)"—SPENCE.

8. Be careful to excel in good works. "Though the apostle does not lay these for foundation, yet he brings them in at their proper place, and then mentions them, not slightly, but as affairs of great importance. He desires that all believers should be 'careful'—have their thoughts upon them: use their best contrivance, their utmost endeavours, not barely to practise, but 'to excel,' to be eminent and distinguished in them: because, though they are not the ground of our reconciliation with God, yet they are amiable and honourable to the Christian profession. And profitable to men—means of increasing the everlasting happiness both of ourselves and others"—WESLEY.

This is a faithful saying. "Then S. Paul, having, in those few but sublime words we have been considering, painted our present happy state,—happy even on earth, where the glorious promised inheritance was still only a hope,—and having shown how that this blessedness was the result of no efforts of our own, but that we owe it solely to the tender love and to the Divine pity of God for man—cries out Yes, 'faithful is this saying'! And these things I will that thou affirm constantly—will that ever and again, in the congregation, these words of mine, woven into the tapestry of creed, or hymn of thanksgiving or supplication, be repeated by the faithful believers in the Lord, to remind them, not only of the glorious hope of eternal life, but also to bring Him to their remembrance to whom they owe this glorious heritage; and as they repeat or hear the words telling them of the wondrous mercy shown to them for no merit or desert of their own, they will the more willingly think kindly of, and act loyally with, other men still living in that deep and loathsome darkness where they once dwelt, until God, in His pity, delivered them"—C. B.

9. Avoid—"'stand aloof' from contention, etc., lit. 'legal disputes,' arising out of interpretations of the Law, such as abound in the Talmud, and of which the question (Matt. 22. 36), 'Which is the great commandment in the Law?' in the spirit in which it was put, is an example"—S. C. The "questions" and "genealogies" have been discussed above. (1 Tim. 1. 4.) The apostle characterises them as "foolish," because they were of an utterly unpractical nature, and consumed time and powers which were needed for other and better things. The "contentions" were disputes and wranglings which arose out of arguments advanced by different teachers upon the "questions" and genealogies." The "strivings about the Law" were, most probably, arguments suggested by disputed and intricate points connected with the Law of Moses. In the Talmud we possess unnumbered instances of all these strange and curious inquiries about which men then gravely disputed and wrangled, but none of which could in any way teach men how to make life more beautiful and loving, more like that fair pattern which S. Paul's Master loved.

10. An heretic, after a first and second admonition, reject—"avoid, leave to himself. This is the only place, in the whole Scripture, where this word 'heretic' occurs; and here it evidently means, a man that obstinately persists in contending about 'foolish questions,' and thereby occasions strife and animosities, schisms and parties in the Church. This, and this alone, is an heretic in the Scripture sense; and his punishment likewise is here fixed:—Shun, avoid him, leave him to himself. As for the Popish sense, 'A man that errs in fundamentals,' although it crept, with many other things, early into the Church, yet it has no shadow of foundation either in the Old or New Testament"—WESLEY.

After one and a second admonition without effect, shun. Nothing more can be done with him. The word does not carry the idea of excommunication which is suggested by our translation. "There was, no doubt, some self-willed, factious party-leader in Crete well-known to S. Paul to whom he referred here; but partly out of a loving hope that Titus would win him to his side, partly from the knowledge that this letter was a public instruction to many a church besides that of Crete, the disturber remained nameless. He was to be exhorted once, twice, and then if he remained contumacious he was to be left simply alone to his own devices. The community over which Titus presided in the place of S. Paul no longer were to know the obstinate heretic as a brother"—ELLICOTT.

11. Such an one is perverted — "in his heart, at least—and sinneth, being self-condemned—being convinced in his own conscience that he acts wrong"—WESLEY.

"Being condemned of himself. This refers to the Judaising teacher, who maintained his party and opinions for filthy lucre's sake. He was conscious of his own insincerity, and that he proclaimed not his system from a conscientious love of truth, but from a desire to get his livelihood"—CLARKE. With these words the official portion of the letter to the presiding presbyter in Crete closes. S. Paul had begun with directions how the church life of the island—up to this period apparently devoid of organisation—was to be arranged; he concludes with instructions how to deal with any who presumed to set themselves in opposition to his plans for the government of the community. The central portion of the letter is occupied in discussing how Christian doctrine is to influence the lives of those accepting it, and especially it treats of the conduct of Christians towards the pagan world, with whom they will necessarily be brought into contact.

12. When I shall send Artemas or Tychicus—"to succeed thee in thy office. Titus was properly an evangelist, who, according to the nature of that office, had no fixed residence; but presiding over other elders, wherever he travelled from place to place, assisting each of the apostles according to the measure of his abilities. Come to me to Nicopolis — very probably not the Nicopolis in Macedonia, as the vulgar subscription asserts (indeed, none of those subscriptions at the end of S. Paul's Epistles are of any authority), rather, it was a town of the same name which lay upon the sea-coast of Epirus. For I have determined to winter there. Hence it appears, he was not there yet, if so, he would have said, to winter

'here.' Consequently, this letter was not written from thence"—WESLEY.

When I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Tychicus, be diligent to come unto me. "But Titus is here reminded—perhaps with some reference to the question of the treatment of the factious or heretic person just alluded to—that he is only the temporary ruler of the Cretan church, on a special commission of the great missionary apostle. Not improbably one of these two was intended to supply the place of Titus, when this faithful and trusted assistant of S. Paul was recalled to his master's side. Of Artemas nothing certainly is known. Tradition, however, makes him subsequently Bishop of Lystra. Tychicus is mentioned in five of the New Testament writings—in Acts 20. 4; Eph. 6. 21; Col. 4. 7; 2 Tim. 4. 12; and here. He seems to have been one of the most esteemed of S. Paul's friends"—SPENCE.

13. Send forward Zenas the lawyer—"either a Roman lawyer or an expounder of the Jewish Law"—WESLEY.

"Of Zenas nothing certain is known; although various traditions of no value make him to have been one of the Seventy, to have written the life of Titus, and to have been Bishop of Diospolis. It is possible that Zenas and Apollos might be the bearers of this Epistle"—WACE. Apollos. This famous teacher appears often in the New Testament records, in the Acts, and several of the Epistles. He was a distinguished scholar and a disciple of John the Baptist, and he was converted to God by the agency of the devoted Priscilla and Aquila, the tent-makers.

14, 15. And let ours—"all our brethren at Crete—learn—both by the admonition and example. Perhaps they had not before assisted Zenas and Apollos as they ought to have done"—WESLEY.

And let ours also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses. "'Ours' that is, those who with S. Paul and Titus in Crete called upon the name of Jesus. A last reminder to the brethren, whom with a loving thought he calls 'ours,' constantly to practise good and beneficent works. In the expression 'let ours also learn' it would seem as though S. Paul would have Christians trained to the wise and thoughtful performance of works of mercy and charity. It was with such injunctions as these that men like S. Paul and S. James laid the foundation storeys of those great Christian works of charity—all undreamed of before the resurrection morning, but which have been for eighteen centuries in all lands the glory of the religion of Jesus—one grand result of the Master's presence with us on earth, which even His bitterest enemies admire with a grudging admiration. In the short compass of these Pastoral Epistles, in all only thirteen chapters, we have no less than eight special reminders to be earnest and zealous in good works. There was evidently a dread in S. Paul's mind that some of those who professed a love of Jesus, and said that they longed after the great salvation, would content themselves with a dreamy acquiescence in the great truths, while the life remained unaltered. It is noteworthy that these Epistles, containing so many urgent exhortations to work for Christ, were S. Paul's last inspired utterances. The passages in question are ch. 1. 16; 2. 7, 14; 3. 14; 1 Tim. 2. 10; 5. 10; 6. 18; 2 Tim. 2. 21. All that are with me salute thee. It is uncertain where S. Paul was when he wrote this letter. 'All that are with me' include those with him, journeying in his company. They are not named, because the individuals composing the immediate following of S. Paul would be likely to be well known to Titus. Greet them that love us in the faith. An inclusive greeting, embracing each member of the Cretan church, whose love to him (S. Paul) was based upon the common faith in the Lord Jesus. Greet all who love me, as the earnest preacher of their faith and mine"—SPENCE. Amen. The greater number of the ancient authorities omit "Amen."

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

"ONESIMUS, a servant to Philemon, an eminent person in Colosse, ran away from his master to Rome. Here he was converted to Christianity by S. Paul, who sent him back to his master with this Letter. It seems Philemon not only pardoned, but gave him his liberty; seeing S. Ignatius makes mention of him as succeeding Timotheus at Ephesus.

"THE LETTER HAS THREE PARTS—

I. The Inscription, ... Chap. i. 1-3.
II. After commending Philemon's faith and love, . . . ,, ,, 4-7.
He desires him to receive Onesimus again, . . . ,, ,, 8-21.
And to prepare a lodging for himself, ... ,, ,, 22.
III. The Conclusion, ... ,, ,, 23-25."
—WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

1. "This single Epistle infinitely transcends all the wisdom of the world. And it gives us a specimen how Christians ought to treat of secular affairs from higher principles. Paul, a prisoner of Christ—to whom, as such, Philemon could deny nothing. And Timotheus. This was written before the Second Epistle to Timothy (ver. 22)"—WESLEY.

It will be observed that S. Paul does not give himself the title of apostle in this place. The very first word in which he speaks of himself is pathetic. He refers to his chains no less than five times in this short letter (vers. 1, 9, 10, 13, 23). He feels it glorious to suffer shame for his Lord's sake, and blessed to inherit the beatitude of those who are "persecuted for righteousness' sake" (Matt. 5. 10). He literally fulfils the exhortation of S. Peter (1 Pet. 4. 14–16). HIERON says: "To me it seems a loftier thing that he should style himself prisoner of Jesus Christ than apostle. The apostles gloried because 'they were counted worthy to suffer shame for His name' (Acts 5. 41); but the authority of bonds is irresistible. He who is about to plead for Onesimus feels that he should plead in such a form that he could not be refused." "And Timothy our brother—Timothy is joined with S. Paul in the opening verse of two other Epistles of the captivity. (Phil. 1. 1; Col. 1. 1.) The addition of Timothy's name would add weight to S. Paul's request"—S. C.

2. To Apphia—"his wife, to whom also the business in part belonged—and the church in thy house—the Christians who meet there"—WESLEY.

"It seems in the highest degree probable that Apphia was Philemon's wife; probable, but in a lower degree, that Archippus was their son. The mention of a woman between two such men, one the apostle's 'fellow-labourer' (ver. 1), the other his fellow-soldier (ver. 2), is a noble example of the spirit of the gospel, and of S. Paul's language, 'neither male nor female' (Gal. 3. 28). It is an unobtrusive yet real hint of the elevation of woman, as the whole letter is of the release of the other victim of classical civilisation, the slave"—S. C. Church in thy house. "The especially domestic and personal character of the Epistle need not induce any limitation of the phrase to Philemon's own family. As the joining of Timothy's name in giving the salutation did not prevent the letter from being S. Paul's only, so the joining the church in the house in the receiving of the salutation does not prevent its being addressed only to Philemon and his family, who were, like himself, interested in Onesimus"—BARRY.

4. Making mention of thee always. S. CHRYSOSTOM here gives us another of his touches of delicate insight. S. Paul would not have Philemon think that his letter was only for the slave—that, but for Onesimus, he might never have written at all. See then how S. Paul indicates other reasons for writing, one here, another in ver. 22.

5. Hearing—"probably from Onesimus"—WESLEY.

"The idea which runs through the letter is Philemon's love to the saints. In writing of that love S. Paul cannot refrain from referring to its true origin—the faith towards the Lord Jesus Christ. Hence the broken phrase. The sense seems therefore to be that which in some MSS. has been brought out by a natural correction, thy faith towards the Lord Jesus, and thy love to all the saints. I thank my God. Note the almost exact verbal coincidence with the salutations in Eph. 1. 15, 16; Phil. 1. 1–6; Col. 1. 3, 4, with, however, the natural distinction that this is briefer and simpler in style"—C. B.

6. "I pray that the communication of thy faith may become effectual—that is, that thy faith may be effectually communicated to others, who see and acknowledge thy piety and charity"—WESLEY.

That the communication of thy faith. The general idea of S. Paul's prayer for Philemon is clear—that his "faith may become effectual," i.e. energetic and perfected, "in full knowledge." This is exactly the prayer which, in different forms and degrees of emphasis, opens all the Epistles of the captivity. (See Eph. 1. 17; Phil. 1. 9; Col. 1. 9.) It describes the true order of Christian life, so fully and beautifully drawn out in Eph. 3. 17–19, beginning in faith, deepened by love, and so growing to knowledge. HAMMOND says: "There is another kind of 'communicativeness'—the performing of all Christian offices of love—(1) praying with and for one another, (2) praising God with and for one another."

7. The saints—"to whom Philemon's house was open (ver. 2)"—WESLEY.

The apostle speaks here of the works of charity in which Philemon abounded towards poor Christians.

8. I might be bold in Christ—"through the authority He hath given me"—WESLEY.

"The balance and propriety of S. Paul's language in this place is not always understood. He does not say, 'I have no right at all to command you,' but 'authority I have to command your obedience—not, indeed, of earthly rank, but in the sphere of Christ.' This mingled tone of command and entreaty is the exact reflex of the mingled respect and affection which, in his earliest Epistle, he claims for the ministerial office (1 Thess. 5. 12, 14). There are two spirits which have prevailed in the Christian ministry at different times and in different circumstances—the spirit of the hierarch and the spirit of the religious demagogue. S. Paul's tone here shows that he was too humble for the first, and too full of gentle dignity for the second. The argument (vers. 7, 8, 9) is well and pointedly put by S. CHRYSOSTOM, 'You refresh others; refresh me, both for Christ's sake and because it is becoming, consonant with right reason, and because love gives'"—S. C.

9. Yet out of love I rather entreat thee. "In how handsome a manner does the apostle just hint, and immediately drop, the consideration of his power to command, and tenderly 'entreat' Philemon to hearken to his friend, his aged friend, and now prisoner for Christ! With what endearment, in the next verse, does he call Onesimus his son, before he names his name! And as soon as he had mentioned it, with what fine address does he just touch on his former faults, and instantly pass on to the happy change that was now made upon him!—so disposing Philemon to attend to his request, and the motives wherewith he was going to enforce it"—WESLEY.

Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ. "At this time S. Paul must have been between fifty and sixty, and after a life of unexampled labour and suffering he might well call himself 'aged,' not, perhaps, in comparison with Philemon, but in relation to his need of ministry from his 'son' Onesimus. It has been suggested by Dr. Lightfoot that we should read here (by a slight change, or without any change, in the original), 'the ambassador, and also the prisoner of Jesus Christ.' The parallel with Eph. 6. 20—'for which I am an ambassador in bonds'—and, indeed, with the tone in which S. Paul in the other Epistles speaks of his captivity as his glory, is tempting. But the change seems to take much from the peculiar beauty and pathos of the passage; which, from its appeal to love rather than to authority, suits especially with the thought, not of the glory of ambassadorship for Christ, but of the weakness of an old age suffering in chains"—C. B.

10. Whom I have begotten in my bonds—"the son of my age"—WESLEY.

"It is evident from this that Onesimus was converted by S. Paul while he was prisoner at Rome, and perhaps not long before he wrote this Epistle"—CLARKE.

11. Now profitable. "None should be expected to be a good servant before he is a good man. He manifestly alludes to his name, Onesimus, which signifies, 'profitable'"—WESLEY.

"How softly does S. Paul here speak! Not that Onesimus' sin was small, or that he would have any, much less himself, to so regard it; but having been humbled for it, and doubtless taken shame to himself on account thereof, the apostle now would not sink his spirit by continuing to burden him therewith, but speaks thus tenderly when he was pleading with Philemon not to make severe reflections on his servant's faults, but to forgive. The argument here urged is this: It will now be for thy advantage to receive him; thus changed as he is, thou mayest expect him to be a dutiful and faithful servant, though in time past he was not so"—M. HENRY.

12. Receive him, that is, my own bowels—"whom I love as my own soul. Such is the natural affection of a father in Christ toward his spiritual children"—WESLEY.

"I love him as I do myself, and have sent him back to thee that thou should'st so receive him; do it therefore for my sake."

13. To serve me in thy stead—"to do those services for me which thou, if present, wouldest gladly have done thyself"—WESLEY.

In thy stead. "A delicate assumption of Philemon's tender affection, as well as of the overwhelming obligation under which he lay to S. Paul. That obligation extended even to personal ministration, such as might lighten some of the inconveniences of captivity"—S. C.

14. That thy benefit might not be by constraint—"for Philemon could not have refused it"—WESLEY.

The benefit derived from the service of Onesimus S. Paul acknowledges as coming from Philemon, because given with his consent. He will not keep Onesimus and ask that consent by letter, lest it should be as it were of necessity, i.e. lest it should wear even the semblance of constraint. "S. Jerome from this passage justly deduces as a conclusion that S. Paul held the principle that 'nothing in moral action is good which is not voluntary.' He applies it to the solution of the question which has been so often asked, 'Why God did not make men absolutely good?' 'God might have made man good, without man's will. But, had He done so, the good would not have been voluntary but necessary. But what is necessarily good is not good in the highest sense, and is even relatively and in another point of view evil. Therefore, in leaving us to our own free will, He made us more truly after His image and likeness'"—HIERON.

15. God might permit him to be separated (a soft word) for a season, that thou mightest have him for ever—both on earth and in heaven"—WESLEY.

"Charity would so hope and judge, yea, so it would be; yet the apostle speaks cautiously, that none might be bold to make another such experiment in expectance of a like gracious issue. God often brings gain to His own people out of their losses"—M. HENRY.

16. In the flesh—"as a dutiful servant. In the Lord — as a fellow-Christian"—WESLEY.

In these words we have at last the principle which is absolutely destructive of the condition of slavery—a condition which is the exaggeration of natural inferiority to the effacement of the deeper natural equality. The slave is bought by Christ's blood, made a Son of God, and therefore a brother to all who are members of the family of God. To reject and to outrage him is a rejection and outrage towards Christ. Compare S. Peter's striking comparison of the sufferings of the slave to the passion of the Divine Sufferer (1 Pet. 2. 18–24). They suffer with Him, and He suffers in them. It has been proved historically that only by the aid of this last and highest conception has the brotherhood of love—too slowly, indeed, but yet surely—assumed reality.

17. If thou accountest me a partner—"so that thy things are mine, and mine are thine"—WESLEY.

A partner. The title is peculiar. In the singular number (in which it is naturally more distinctive) and in absolute use, unconnected with explanatory words (such as we read in 1 Pet. 5. 1), it is nowhere else found, except in 2 Cor. 8. 23, where Titus is called S. Paul's "partner and fellow-helper"; and even there the context defines the partnership as relating to the collection and ministration of alms. Here it can hardly refer to general Christian fellowship, which would require some such words as "in Christ," or "in the Spirit," and would not fully justify the strong personal appeal of the passage. It must indicate some peculiar bond of fellowship between S. Paul and Philemon.

18. If he hath wronged thee, etc. "The form only in this sentence is hypothetical. The case is put as one which is absolutely unquestionable. No doubt Onesimus robbed his master when he ran away. The consequence of this is a debt at present unpaid. He wronged Philemon once for all, and consequently is in debt, if he has stolen—as he has done—and so is in debt. Flight and theft were instinctively associated in the mind of Romans as the kindred offences of slaves. It will be observed that S. Paul's teaching was not socialistic. Not private property, but the abstraction of it was theft in his estimation. Put that on mine account. Can the apostle be pointing to an imitation of the great imputation: 'If He took our infirmities and bare our stripes, the apostle in like manner puts himself for Onesimus, and pledges himself for his debt'? (Hieron). Philemon would receive a magnificent recompense—for a fugitive slave, a brother for ever; for the money he lost, an apostle as his debtor"—S. C.

19. I will repay it—"if thou requirest it. Not to say, that thou owest me thyself—it cannot be expressed, how great our obligation is to those who have gained our souls to Christ. Besides—receiving Onesimus"—WESLEY.

"It is clear from this passage that the apostle had money which he could rightly call his own. At Ephesus, where he probably first knew Philemon, it would probably be earned in the work with Aquila and Priscilla, as at Corinth, and it is possible that some of it might still remain. In Rome now, it could hardly be from any other source than the offerings from the church at Philippi. They were given him freely; he might fairly spend them on his own 'son in the faith.' Albeit I do not say to thee—lit. 'not to say to thee.' Here S. Paul escapes from the business-like promise of the last verse to the freer atmosphere of spiritual relations. He knew that this promise it was right for him to offer, but wrong for Philemon to accept. Philemon owed his own self—his new self in Christ—to the apostle. In that was a debt which he could not repay, but would rejoice even in this smaller matter to acknowledge"—BARRY.

20. Refresh my bowels in Christ—"give me the most exquisite and Christian pleasure"—WESLEY.

Philemon was S. Paul's "son in the faith," yet he entreats him as "a brother"; Onesimus a poor slave, yet he solicits for him as if he were seeking some great thing for himself.

21. Do more than I say. This can hardly refer to anything except the manumission of Onesimus, and possibly his being sent back again to S. Paul. Exactly in this way Christianity was to work out the release of the slave—not by command, but by free and natural inference from its emphatic declaration of his true brotherhood in Christ.

22. Given to you—"restored to liberty"—WESLEY.

A lodging. The word often signifies "hospitality" generally, which Philemon might naturally offer in his own house, but which S. Paul would not suggest or ask.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

"IT is agreed by the general tenor of antiquity that this Epistle was written by S. Paul, whose other Epistles were sent to the Gentile converts; this only to the Hebrews. But this improper inscription was added by some later hand. It was sent to the Jewish Hellenist Christians, dispersed through various countries. S. Paul's method and style are easily observed therein. He places, as usual, the proposition and division before the treatise (Heb. 2. 17); he subjoins the exhortatory to the doctrinal part; quotes the same scriptures (Heb. 2. 8; 10. 30, 38; 1. 6); and uses the same expressions as elsewhere. But why does he not prefix his name, which, it is plain from Heb. 3. 19, was dear to them to whom he wrote? Because he prefixes no inscription, in which, if at all, the name would have been mentioned. The ardour of his spirit carries him directly upon his subject (just like S. John in his First Epistle), and throws back his usual salutation and thanksgiving to the conclusion.

"This Epistle of S. Paul, and both those of S. Peter (one may add, that of S. James and of S. Jude also), were written to the same persons, dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, and other countries, and nearly at the same time. S. Paul suffered at Rome, three years before the destruction of Jerusalem. Therefore this Epistle, likewise, was written while the Temple was standing. S. Peter wrote a little before his martyrdom, and refers to the Epistles of S. Paul; this in particular.

"The scope of it is, to confirm their faith in Christ; and this he does by demonstrating His glory. All the parts of it are full of the most earnest and pointed admonitions and exhortations; and they go on in one tenor, the particle therefore everywhere connecting the doctrine and the use.

"The Sum is, The Glory of Christ appears—

I. From comparing with Him the prophets and angels, . Chap. i. 1–14.
Therefore we ought to give heed to Him, ... ,, ii. 1–4.

II. From His Passion and Consummation:
Here we may observe—
1. The proposition and sum, ... ,, ,, 5–9.
2. The Treatise itself. We have a perfect author of salvation, who suffered for our sake, that He might be (1) a merciful, and (2) a faithful (3) High Priest, ... ,, ,, 10–13.

These three are particularly explained, His Passion and Consummation being continually interwoven.

1. He has the virtues of an High Priest:
(a) He is faithful, ... ,, iii. 1.
Therefore be ye not unfaithful, . . ,, iv. 13.
(b) He is merciful, ... ,, ,, 15.
Therefore come to Him with confidence, . ,, v. 3.
2. He is called of God an High Priest. Here:
(a) The sum is proposed, ... ,, ,, 4–10.
With a summary exhortation, . . Chap. v. 11—vi. 20.
(b) The point is copiously—
1. Explained. We have a great High Priest:
(1) Such as is described in Ps. 110.:
After the order of Melchisedec, . Chap. vii. 1–19.
Established by an oath, . . ,, ,, 20–22.
For ever, ... ,, ,, 23–28.
(2) Therefore peculiarly excellent:
Heavenly, ... ,, viii. 1–6.
Of the new covenant, . . . ,, ,, 7–13.
By whom we have an entrance into the sanctuary . . Chap. ix. 1, x. 18.
2. Applied. Therefore—
(1) Believe, hope, love, . . Chap. x. 19–25.

These three are further inculcated—
(a) Faith with patience, . .	Chap. x. 26–39.

(c) Love, ...	,, xiii. 1–6.
(2) In order to grow in these graces, make use of
The remembrance of your former, .	,, ,, 7–16.
The vigilance of your present, pastors,	,, ,, 17–19.
To this period, and to the whole Epistle, answers—
The Prayer, the Doxology, and the mild Conclusion, . . .	,, ,, 20–25.

"There are many comparisons in this Epistle, which may be nearly reduced to two heads—(1) The prophets, the angels, Moses, Joshua, Aaron, are great; but Jesus Christ is infinitely greater. (2) The ancient believers enjoyed high privileges; but Christian believers enjoy far higher. To illustrate this, examples both of happiness and misery are everywhere interspersed: so that in this Epistle there is a kind of recapitulation of the whole Old Testament. In this also Judaism is abrogated, and Christianity carried to its height"—WESLEY.

THE following is extracted from the Introduction of the Commentary on the Epistle to Hebrews by Dr. MOULTON, edited by Dr. ELLICOTT:—

AUTHORSHIP.

"The character of the Epistle is beyond all question Paul-like (if we may so speak, to avoid the ambiguity of "Pauline"). If, then, it is not to be ascribed directly to S. Paul, we must suppose either (1) that it is a translation from a Hebrew original written by him; or (2) that, whilst the substance of the Epistle is his, the diction and style belong to one of his companions, who, for some unexplained cause, put the apostle's thoughts into form; or (3) that the Epistle was written by a friend or disciple of S. Paul. Each of the four hypotheses may, as we have said, claim the evidence of early writers; but it is a matter of extreme difficulty rightly to estimate the value of this evidence. That the Epistle was directly written by S. Paul is an opinion of which we have no distinct evidence earlier than the third century.

"Much favour has in recent times been shown to the other tradition which Origen records—that the Epistle was written by S. Luke. The resemblance of language between this Epistle and S. Luke's writings are numerous and striking; but with all this there is great dissimilarity of style. The difference between a Letter such as this and historical or biographical memoirs must indeed be taken into account; but even when allowance has been made for this, it is difficult to receive the writer of the Acts as the author of our Epistle. Another consideration also is of weight. We can hardly doubt that we have before us here the work of a Jew; but S. Paul's words in Col. 4. 11–14, imply that S. Luke was of Gentile birth.

"The subject is not one for confident assertion; but we strongly doubt whether the Epistle can be ascribed to any of those suggested by ancient writers. One other hypothesis must be mentioned, which has commanded the adhesion of many of the ablest writers of recent times. Luther was the first to express (in his Commentary on Genesis) an opinion that the Epistle to the Hebrews was the work of Apollos. Some will maintain that conjecture is inadmissible, but certainly all the conditions of the problem appear to be satisfied by this conjecture. The record of S. Luke in Acts 18. 24–28, 19. 1, supplemented by S. Paul's references in 1 Corinthians, might seem to have been expressly designed to show the special fitness of Apollos for writing such an Epistle as this."

CHAPTER I.

VERS. 1–14.—He in whom God has at last revealed Himself to man is Son of God, exalted above all angels.

1. God, who at sundry times. "The creation was revealed in the time of Adam; the last judgment, in the time of Enoch; and so at various times, and in degrees, more explicit knowledge was given. In divers manners—in visions, in dreams, and by revelations of various kinds. Both these are opposed to the one entire and perfect revelation which He has made to us by Jesus Christ. The very number of the prophets showed that they prophesied only 'in part.' Of old. There were no prophets for a large tract of time before Christ came, that the great Prophet might be the more earnestly expected. Spake. A part is put for the whole; implying every kind of Divine communication—by the prophets—the mention of whom is a virtual declaration that the apostle received the whole Old Testament, and was not about to advance any doctrine in contradiction to it. Hath in these last times—intimating that no other revelation is to be expected — spoken — all things, and in the most perfect manner. By His Son — alone. The Son spake by the apostles. The majesty of the Son of God is proposed—(1) Absolutely, by the very name of 'Son' (ver. 2), and by three glorious predicates — 'whom He hath appointed,' 'by whom He made,' who 'sat down,' whereby He is described from the beginning to the consummation of all things (vers. 2, 3). (2) Comparatively to angels (ver. 4). The proof of this proposition immediately follows: the name of 'Son' being proved (ver. 5); His being 'heir of all things' (vers. 6–9); His making the worlds (vers. 10–12); His sitting at God's right hand (vers. 13, etc.)"—WESLEY.

God, who at sundry times. "The fine arrangement of the words in the A.V. fails, it must be confessed, to convey the emphasis which is designed in the original. The writer's object is to place the former revelation over against that which has now been given; and the remarkable words with which the chapter opens (and which might not inaptly serve as the motto of the whole Epistle) strike the first note of contrast. If we may imitate the artistic arrangement of the Greek, the verse will run thus, 'In many portions and in many ways God having of old spoken unto the fathers in the prophets.' To the fathers of the Jewish people (comp. Rom. 9. 5) God's word was given part by part, and in divers manners. It came in the revelation of the patriarchal age, in the successive portions of Holy Writ; in the ministry of law, and of prophecy, and of promise, ever growing clearer through the teaching of experience and history. At one time the word came in direct precept, at another in typical ordinance or act, at another in parable or psalm. The word thus dealt out in fragments and variously imparted was God's word, for the revealing Spirit of God was 'in the prophets' (2 Cor. 13. 3). We must not unduly limit the application of 'prophet'; besides those to whom the name is directly given, there were many who were representatives of God to His people, and interpreters of His will. (Comp. Num. 11. 26, 29; Ps. 105. 15)"—MOULTON.

"The phrase, in sundry portions and in divers manners, i.e. 'in various parts and in many forms,' does not indicate any inferiority of the Old Testament revelation to the New, arising from its fragmentariness and the colour it received from circumstances and the many prophetic minds through whom it came. The expression rather signalises the variety and fulness of the Old Testament Word of God. The words to the fathers and to us mark another point of difference. The fathers are the Church and saints of Israel's past, for the writer is an Hebrew speaking to Hebrews; and 'to us' means to men posterior to the advent of Christ. God's speaking to the fathers extended over many ages, just as the succession of prophets did, in whom He spake; for though His revelation of the covenant, the chief word that He spake of old, was made through Moses, the greatest of the prophets (Deut. 34. 10; Hos. 12. 13; Acts 7. 37), to Israel of the Exodus, He raised up prophets in every age to expound and enforce it. But His speaking to us was bounded by the brief term of the Son's life upon earth. The words 'to us' might indicate the finality of the revelation given in the Son, for 'we' are they 'on whom the ends of the world are come' (1 Cor. 10. 11), and God's design was that 'they without us should not be made perfect' (ch. 11. 40). The Son is the greatest and last messenger of God to men. He makes the final revelation (ver. 2)"—DAVIDSON.

2. Whom He hath appointed heir of all things. "After the name of Son, His inheritance is mentioned. God 'appointed' Him the 'heir' long before He made the worlds (Eph. 3. 11; Prov. 8. 22, etc.). The Son is the firstborn, born before all things: the 'heir' is a term relating to the creation which followed (ver. 6). By whom He also made the worlds — therefore the Son was before all worlds. His glory reaches from everlasting to everlasting, though God spake by Him to us only 'in these last days'"—WESLEY.

Hath in these last days, etc.—"better, 'at the end of these days spake unto us in a Son.' The thought common to the two verses is 'God hath spoken to man'; in all other respects the past and the present stand contrasted. The manifold successive partial disclosures of God's will have given place to one revelation, complete and final; for He who spake in the prophets hath now spoken 'in a Son.' The whole stress lies on these last words. The rendering 'a Son' may at first cause surprise, but it is absolutely needed; not, 'Who is the Revealer?' but 'What is He?' is the question answered in these words. The writer does not speak of 'a Son' in the sense of one out of many; the very contrast with the prophets (who in the lower sense were amongst God's sons) would be sufficient to prove this, but the words which follow, and the whole contents of this chapter, are designed to show the supreme dignity of Him who is God's latest Representative on earth. Whom He hath appointed—better, 'whom He appointed': in the Divine counsels He was constituted heir of all things"—MOULTON.

Whom He set heir of all things. "The verse gives a view of the Christian Mediator in His entire history, which was necessary in order to a full contrast with the mediators of the first covenant. The words represent the entire line of His history as He is related to God, and the end of the line, God's making Him heir of all things, was becoming the beginning of it, His being His Son and agent in making the worlds, and could not have been possible for any but the Son"—DAVIDSON.

3. Who sat down—"the third of these glorious predicates, with which three other particulars are interwoven (which are mentioned likewise and in the same order, Col. 1. 15, 17, 20). Who being. The glory which He received in His exaltation at the right hand of the Father no angel was capable of, but the Son alone, who likewise enjoyed it long before. The brightness of His glory. Glory is the nature of God revealed in its brightness. The express image—or stamp. Whatever the Father is, is exhibited in the Son, as a seal in the stamp on wax. Of His person—or substance. The word denotes the unchangeable perpetuity of Divine life and power. And sustaining all things—visible and invisible, in being. By the word of His power—that is, by His powerful word. When He had by Himself—without any Mosaic rites or ceremonies—purged our sins: in order to which it was necessary He should for a time divest Himself of His glory. In this chapter S. Paul describes His glory, chiefly as He is the Son of God; afterwards, Heb. 2. 6, etc., the glory of the man, Christ Jesus. He speaks, indeed, briefly of the former before His humiliation, but copiously after His exaltation; as from hence the glory He had from eternity began to be evidently seen. Both His purging our sins, and sitting at the right hand of God, are largely treated of in the seven following chapters. Sat down—the priests stood while they ministered; sitting, therefore, denotes the consummation of His sacrifice. This word, 'sat down,' contains the scope, the theme, and the sum of the Epistle"—WESLEY.

"This verse is exactly parallel in meaning to ver. 2, with one difference. Ver. 2 describes the Son in relation to God, and His history as something which God did unto Him; ver. 3 describes the Son in His own nature, and His history as something done by Himself under the impulse and in the power of His nature. The end of the history is the same in both cases, for 'made heir' corresponds to sat down, and the beginning is the same, for brightness of His glory is but an expansion of 'Son'; but the connection between the beginning and the end differs; the passage from 'Son' to 'heir' is through 'made the worlds,' while the passage from 'brightness of His glory' to sat down at His right hand is through having made purification of sins. Heirship of all things is the dignity befitting sonship, and only possible to a son; but it is more befitting, inasmuch as the Son was the maker of all things: sitting at the right hand of God is becoming one who is the brightness of His glory, and only possible to one of this Divine nature; but it was reached through making purification of sins. The one place which the Son now occupies was reached along two lines—one, the line of His essential being; the other, that of His moral history. Who being the brightness of His glory—lit. 'effulgence' of His glory. 'Being' describes what the Son was in His own nature, and the following words merely expand 'Son.' The reference is to the pre-existing state of the Son, what He was in Himself, which certainly explains how He sat down at the right hand of God. There scarcely seems material for answering the question, Was the Son the brightness of God's glory also in the days of His flesh? 'Glory' is not any external halo that surrounds the Divine nature; it is the Divine nature itself in its majesty and as manifested to the world. Purged our sins. To make purification of sins is to remove them by purification, to purify them away. The language is suggested by the Old Testament practice of sprinkling blood upon whatever was defiled by the sinful contact or manipulation of man. Things so sprinkled with sacrificial blood had the uncleanness that adhered to them purified away (ch. 9. 21, etc.). This is the Old Testament ceremonial in the sphere of the copies of things, to which corresponds the efficacy of Christ's blood in the sphere of the true things

(ch. 9. 23). The author, however, in his brief summary of the great steps through which the Son rose to the right hand of God, merely mentions this purification, postponing the full illustration of it till further on. (Ch. 9. 11–14; comp. 10. 20)"—DAVIDSON.

4. "This verse has two clauses, the latter of which is treated of (ver. 5), the former (ver. 13). Such transpositions are also found in the other Epistles of S. Paul, but in none so frequently as in this. The Jewish doctors were peculiarly fond of this figure, and used it much in all their writings. The apostle, therefore, becoming all things to all men, here follows the same method. All the inspired writers were readier in all the figures of speech than the most experienced orators. Being—by His exaltation, after He had been lower than them (Heb. 2. 9). So much higher than the angels. It was extremely proper to observe this because the Jews gloried in their Law, as it was delivered by the ministration of angels. How much more may we glory in the gospel, which was given, not by the ministry of angels, but of the very Son of God! As He hath by inheritance a more excellent name—because He is the Son of God, He inherits that name, in right whereof He inherits all things. His inheriting that name is more ancient than all worlds; His inheriting all things, as ancient as all things. Than they. This denotes an immense pre-eminence. The angels do not inherit all things, but are themselves a portion of the Son's inheritance, whom they worship as their Lord"—WESLEY.

"The apostle proceeds to the main argument of this part of his discourse—the superiority of our Lord to the angels. His first position is that, as Mediator, the Son is seated on the right hand of God; a distinction far beyond that of the most exalted creature. But this surpassing dignity resulted from the glory of His pre-existent state; and the doctrine of the rest of the chapter is that, in His relation to the work of redemption, He is as far superior to the angelic ministers of the Divine will as He was in His eternal nature. When our Lord is said to possess a name more excellent than the angels, it is to His nature, His essential qualities or relations, and not to His title or His official rank or dignity, that attention is primarily and specifically demanded"—TREFFRY. This verse states explicitly the contrast between the present redemptive place of the Son (which embraces and is only possible through His being the Son), but was reached through His life in the flesh (ch. 2. 9) as sketched in vers. 1–3, and the place of the angels. The Son became "better" than the angels. This redemptive dignity to which the Son attained was in harmony with His name of Son (comp. 3. 6; 5. 5), and is as much higher than the place of angels as the name of Son, which belongs to Him, is more excellent than the name of "angels" or messengers by which they are called. (Comp. Phil. 2. 7, etc.; Eph. 1. 20, etc.) This contrast of the Son with the angels is for the purpose of showing His superiority generally to all beings, even the highest, but especially to the angels as revealers of the Old Testament covenant and heads of the Old Testament world (ch. 2). The contrast is properly one of the two worlds in the persons of their heads.

5. Thou art My Son—"God of God, Light of Light. This day have I begotten thee—I have begotten Thee from eternity, which, by its unalterable permanency of duration, is one continued, unsuccessive day. I will be to Him a Father, and He shall be to Me a Son—I will own Myself to be His Father, and Him to be My Son, by eminent tokens of My peculiar love. The former clause relates to His natural Sonship, by an eternal, inconceivable generation; the other, to His Father's acknowledgment and treatment of Him as His incarnate Son. Indeed this promise related immediately to Solomon, but in a far higher sense to the Messiah"—WESLEY.

For unto which of the angels, etc. "'God has spoken of the Messiah as His Son, a title which no angel ever receives from Him.' That the appellation 'sons of God' may be used in an inferior sense, and that thus angels may be so designated (Job 1. 6; 38. 7), does not affect this argument; for every reader must perceive that in these quotations 'Son' is used of One, and in a sense that is unique. The two quotations are taken from Ps. 2. 7 and 2 Sam. 7. 14. It seems probable that the second Psalm was written by David during the troublous times of (2 Sam. 8.–10.) in the fresh recollection of the promises of which we read in 2 Sam. 7. In the midst of the rebellious conspiracies of kings and nations is heard Jehovah's word, 'Yet have I set My King upon My holy hill of Zion' (Ps. 2. 6). In ver. 7 the anointed King declares the Divine decree, 'The Lord hath said unto Me, thou art my Son; this day have I begotten Thee'; and the following verses describe the kingly dominion of the Son"—MOULTON. "S. Paul here institutes an argument upon this very passage in the second Psalm, to prove the superiority of Christ to the angels. The force of the argument lies in the expression begotten, importing that the Person addressed is the Son of God, not by creation but by generation. Christ's pre-eminence over the angels is here stated to consist in this, that, whereas they were created, He is begotten; and the apostle's reasoning is fallacious, unless this expression intimates a proper and peculiar filiation"—WATSON.

6. And again—"that is, in another scripture—He—God—saith when He bringeth in His first-begottcn. This appellation includes that of Son, together with the rights of primogeniture, which the First-begotten Son of God enjoys, in a manner not communicable to any creature. Into the world—namely, at His Incarnation. He saith, Let all the angels of God worship Him—so much higher was He, when in His lowest estate, than the highest angel"—WESLEY.

"The term First-born is a recognised name of the Messiah. Primarily it expresses priority to all creatures (Col. 1. 15), and in this sense God Himself receives the name of 'First-born,' but here probably it means nothing more than Son with the additional idea that the Son is greatly honoured and heir (Ps. 89. 27). Being heir He shall be brought again into the world of men and installed into His inheritance, and then shall all the angels worship Him. The present saith is used of words ever present in Scripture. And let . . . worship Him. Words somewhat similar are found in Ps. 97. 7, 'Worship Him all His angels' (LXX.). Most probably the exact words are taken from Deut. 32. 43 in the Greek translation, which here contains some verses not found in the Hebrew. The Song of Moses is there run out so as to present a picture of the consummation of all things, in which the manifestation of Jehovah for salvation and judgment, and the universal homage to Him of all beings constitute the main features. The point of view of the psalm is the same. But this manifestation of Jehovah is no other, as the progress of revelation has shown, than His manifestation in the Messiah, Jesus Christ. Hence what is said of Jehovah is applied to Christ as He has appeared, and shall appear again for judgment and salvation"—DAVIDSON.

7. Who maketh His angels. "This implies, they are only creatures, whereas the Son is eternal (ver. 8); and the Creator Himself (ver. 10). Spirits and a flame of fire—which intimates not only their office, but also their nature; which is excellent indeed, the metaphor being taken from the most swift, subtle, and efficacious things on earth; but nevertheless infinitely below the majesty of the Son"—WESLEY.

His angels spirits—better, "His angels winds." The quotation is from Ps. 104. 4, according to the Greek translation. Two things are expressed—first, the service of the angels; and, second, their alliance in this service to the material elements; under God's transforming hand they suffer a change into winds and a flame of fire. This idea is not to be pressed so far as to imply that the angelic essence undergoes a transformation into material substance, but only that the angels are clothed with this material form, and in their service assume this shape to men.

8. O God. "God, in the singular number, is never in Scripture used absolutely of any but the supreme God. Thy reign, of which the sceptre is the ensign, is full of justice and equity"—WESLEY.

"The argument of the apostle here determines the sense in which he calls Jesus, the Son, God, and the view he entertains of His nature. Angels and men are the only rational created beings in the universe which are mentioned by the sacred writers. The apostle argues, that Christ is superior even to angels; that they are but ministers, He a Sovereign, seated on a throne; that they worship Him, and that He receives their worship; that they are creatures, but He the Creator"—WATSON. "In this and the following verses the apostle proceeds to exhibit from another passage in the Psalms how far exalted above the angels is the Son. The angels are subject to change, according to the will of God, whose servants they are, while HE is the unchangeable, ever-reigning KING. The chief point of the antithesis is the dependent and changing service, in contrast to the Divine and immutable sovereignty"—DELITZSCH.

9. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity—"thou art infinitely pure and holy. Therefore God—who, as thou art Mediator, is thy God—hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness—with the Holy Ghost, the fountain of joy—above Thy fellows—above all the children of men"—WESLEY.

"God declares of Christ how He was qualified for the office of Mediator and how He was installed and confirmed in it. God's anointing of Christ signifies both His qualifying of Him for the office of Mediator, with the Holy Spirit and all His graces, and likewise His inauguration of Him into the office, as prophets, priests, and kings were, by anointing"—M. HENRY. Anointed with oil . . . fellows. As kings were anointed when called to the throne, the phrase means, made King. Gladness describes the height and joy of the rule to which this King is called. His "fellows" in the Psalms are probably other princes; if any special force be attached to the expression here, it no doubt means the angels as dwellers in the city of God (Heb. 12. 22), and thus the fellows of the Son.

10. Thou—"the same to whom the discourse is addressed in the preceding verse"—WESLEY.

"These words (vers. 10–12) are quoted from Ps. 102. 25–27, which all acknowledge to be a loftier description of the eternity of God. They are here applied to Christ; and of Him they affirm that He was before the material universe; that it was created by Him; that He has absolute power of it; that He shall destroy it; that He shall do this with infinite ease, as one folds up a vesture (ver. 12); and that, amidst the decays and changes of material things, He remains the same"—WATSON.

11. And they all, etc.—both the earth and the heavens. See Isa. 34. 4, "The heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll"; and Isa. 51. 6, "The earth shall wax old like a garment."

12. As a mantle—"with all ease. They shall be changed—into new heavens and a new earth. But thou art eternally the same"—WESLEY.

And as a vesture—"rather (see ver. 10). And as a mantle shalt Thou roll them up —as a garment shall they also be changed. The course of thought is easily traced; as the garment which has grown old is rolled up and changed, so the former heavens and earth shall give place to the new heavens and the new earth"—MOULTON.

13. But to which of the angels. "The final appeal is made to that Psalm which more frequently than any other is quoted in reference to Christ, and which we have already seen to be the source of all the New Testament references to the Saviour's session at the right hand of God. It is not necessary to say much here respecting Ps. 110., to which so many allusions will be made in the course of this Epistle. That it was regularly understood by the Jews of our Lord's time to be a messianic Psalm is clear both from Matt. 22. 43, 44, and from the independent notices which we possess. Most probably, it stands alone amongst the Psalms as being simply prophetic; the words of ver. 1 have never been addressed either to angels or to an earthly king"—MOULTON.

14. Are they not all—"though of various orders—ministering spirits sent forth—ministering before God, sent forth to men—to attend on them—in numerous offices of protection, care, and kindness. Who—having patiently continued in welldoing, shall inherit everlasting salvation"—WESLEY.

Final contrast between the place of the Son and that of angels in redemptive history. The Son who sits at God's right hand till all things be put in subjection under His feet (ch. 2. 9; 10. 13) is Himself the end and aim of this history; the angels are all but servants, helping forward its movements. God rules all for the Son; He sends forth the angels to do His service—a service which they render Him even in behalf of men, who shall be heirs of salvation. The citation is from Ps. 110. 1, which might be said to be the text of the Epistle: "Salvation" has two sides; positively, it is inheritance of the world to come, the destined heritage of man (chaps. 2. 3, 10; 5. 9; 6. 9; 9. 28); negatively, it is deliverance from death, which stands in the way of this heritage (ch. 2. 14, etc.; comp. ch. 5. 7), and from all evils that may oppress men till the revelation of the Son from heaven (ch. 7. 25; comp. ch. 9. 28).

TREFFRY says: "The apostle concludes the chapter, by stating the active relations severally of the Son of God and of angels to the evangelical work; a point of contrast not less decisive than those which precede. He sits upon the throne of God. They, on the other hand, are occupied in the services of love and tenderness which are to contribute to the security and joy of His elect, and to the consummation of His glory in the end of the ages." "The last word, salvation, expresses the Divine purpose indicated by all the prophecies that have passed under review. The chapter has been occupied with promises of the Christ: the last word brings before us Jesus, the Saviour"—MOULTON.

CHAPTER II.

VERS. 1–4. These verses must be closely joined with the first chapter. Before advancing to the next step in his argument, the writer pauses to enforce the duty which results from what has been already established. But (as in ch. 4. 14–16) the exhortation does not interrupt the thought, but rather serves as a connecting link.

In this and the two following chapters, the apostle subjoins an exhortation, answering each head of the preceding chapter.

1. Lest we should let them slip—"as water out of a leaky vessel. So the Greek word properly signifies"—WESLEY.

Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard—"better, 'to the things heard'; for this expression contains the complement of the thought of ch. 1. 1. Both 'speak' and 'hear' are words which carry weighty emphasis in this Epistle. (See chaps. 1. 1; 2. 2; 12. 25; 3. 5, 7; 4. 2, et al.) Because of the supreme dignity of Him in whom at the last God speaks, men are bound to give the more earnest heed to the words spoken, whether heard by them from the Lord Himself or (as in this case, ver. 3) from His servants. Lest at any time we should let them slip. This translation (first introduced by the Genevan Bible of 1560) substantially gives the sense, but inverts the figure presented in the Greek. The words must be rendered 'lest possibly we drift away' (Wyclif, 'lest perauenture we fleten awey'). It is the man that is in danger of being carried along by the current; unless the mind be held closely to the words that God has spoken, it must drift away from them, and from the salvation which they promise. There seems no foundation for the rendering of the margin, first given in the Genevan Testament of 1557"—MOULTON.

2. "In giving the Law, God spoke by angels, but in proclaiming the gospel, by His Son. Steadfast—firm and valid. Every transgression—commission of sin. Every disobedience—omission of duty"—WESLEY.

The word spoken by angels—"or rather, 'through angels.' (Comp. ch. 1. 2.) The word was God's 'but angels were the medium through which it was given to men. In accordance with the tone of the whole passage (in which the thought is not the reward of obedience, but the peril of neglect of duty), 'the word' must denote Divine commands delivered by angels, and—as the close parallel presented by ch. 10. 28, 29, seems to prove—especially the commands of the Mosaic Law"—MOULTON.

3. So great a salvation—"a deliverance from so great wickedness and misery, into so great holiness and happiness. This was first spoken of (before He came it was not known) by Him who is the Lord—of angels as well as men. And was confirmed to us—of this age, even every article of it—by them that had heard Him—and had been themselves also both eye-witnesses and ministers of the word"—WESLEY.

How shall we escape. "The 'we' (being expressed in the original) is emphatic—we who are sons, not servants. The verb means 'how shall we succeed in escaping,' or 'make good our escape'—namely, from similar but yet more awful punishment. (Comp. ch. 12. 25.) If we neglect—rather 'after neglecting,' or 'when we have neglected.' So great salvation. The transcendence (ch. 7. 25) of the safety provided is a measure of the guilt involved in ceasing to pay any attention to it. (Ch. 10. 29; John 12. 48.) It came from Christ, not from angels; its sanctions are more eternal; its promises more Divine; its whole character more spiritual. Spoken by the Lord. The gospels show that Jesus was the first preacher of His own gospel. (Mark 1. 14.) The Lord, standing alone, is very rarely, if ever, used as a title for Christ by S. Paul. 1 Thess. 4. 15; 2 Thess. 2. 2; 2 Tim. 4. 18, are, to say the least, indecisive"—FARRAR.

4. By signs and wonders—"while He lived—and various miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost—miraculous gifts, distributed after His exaltation—according to His own will—not theirs who received them"—WESLEY.

God also bearing them witness—"that is, 'bearing witness with them' to the truth they preached. Mark 16. 20 is a striking parallel; see also Acts 4. 30. The Divine attestation was given by miracle and by gifts (lit. 'distributions,' as in the margin, see 1 Cor. 12. 11) 'of the Holy Ghost.' We have here, as in Acts 2. 22 and 2 Cor. 12. 12, the full threefold expression of miracles, as signs and wonders and powers; as wonderful works that are wrought by Divine power, and are thus signs of the Divine presence, and symbols of a corresponding spiritual work"—MOULTON. "Signs to show that there was a power behind their witness; portents, to awaken the feeling of astonishment, and so arouse interest; and various powers. These are alluded to, or recorded, in Mark 16. 20; Acts 2. 43; 19. 11. S. Paul himself appealed to his own 'mighty signs and wonders' (Rom. 15. 18, 19; 1 Cor. 2. 4)"—FARRAR.

Vers. 5–18. It was needful that Jesus, as Author of salvation to man, should in all points be made like to those whom He saves, and in their likeness suffer and die; thus He becomes for them a merciful and faithful High Priest.

5. "This verse contains a proof of the third; the greater the salvation is, and the more glorious the Lord whom we despise, the greater will be our punishment. God hath not subjected the world to come—that is, the dispensation of the Messiah, which, being to succeed the Mosaic, was usually styled by the Jews, 'the world to come,' although it is still in great measure to come. Whereof we now speak—of which I am now speaking. In this last great dispensation the Son alone presides"—WESLEY.

For unto the angels hath He not, etc.—"rather, 'for not unto angels did He put in subjection. There is an unexpressed antithesis in both clauses of the verse—'not unto angels' (but, on the contrary, to man—as prophecy shows, ver. 6) 'did He subject the world to come' (as He subjected this world). The words are the author's general preliminary statement. This is supported by adducing Ps. 8., in which he finds both these things expressed; for that God subjected this world and its inhabitants to angels is expressed in the words, 'Thou madest Him for a little lower than the angels' (ver. 7); and that He did not subject the world to come to angels in the words, 'Thou crownedst Him with glory, and didst put all things under his feet' (vers. 7, 8). The former idea appears in ver. 2, and elsewhere in Scripture (Dan. 4. 13, 17, 23; 10. 13, 20), and in the writings of Jewish theologians. In Deut. 30. 8 the LXX. renders 'angels of God' where the Hebrew reads 'Children of Israel.' The indefinite did put expresses the almost legislative scheme of man's history drawn in Ps. 8. The world to come—lit. 'the inhabited world to come' (ch. 1. 6). The phrase 'to come' does not seem here merely to express the antithesis between 'this world' and the new order of things introduced through Christ; with this there is at least included the idea that this new order is still future. (Comp. 'city to come,' ch. 13. 14; 6. 5.) Throughout the Epistle the great antithesis is 'this world' and 'the world to come.' The former, visible, material, transient, to which belongs, as part of it, the first covenant; the other, real heavenly, and eternal, access into which is through the new covenant. The first is subjected to angels, particularly as revealers of the Law; but under their rule seems embraced the whole pre-Christian condition of things, embracing man in his earthly and mortal condition. Salvation is escape from this and possession of the heavenly world. In this world to come the angels have no more rule; all things, without exception, are put in subjection to man (ver. 8)"—DAVIDSON.

6. What is man—"to the vast expanse of heaven, to 'the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained'? This Psalm seems to have been composed by David, in a clear, moonshiny, and starlight night, while he was contemplating the wonderful fabric of heaven; because in his magnificent description of its luminaries, he takes no notice of the sun, the most glorious of them all. The words here cited concerning dominion were doubtless in some sense applicable to Adam; although in their complete and highest sense they belong to none but the second Adam. Or the son of man, that Thou visitest him? The sense rises; we are mindful of Him that is absent; but to 'visit' denotes the care of a present God"—WESLEY.

But one in a certain place, etc.—"better, 'somewhere.' The expression is perfectly indefinite. (Comp. ch. 4. 4.) As a rule, the words of Scripture are in this Epistle quoted as God's own utterances; and though the nature of the quotation (which is an address to God) made this impossible here, the writer seems gladly to avoid the mention of the human prophet, perhaps as distracting the thought from the Divine prophecy. This studious indefiniteness in citation is common in Philo, and sometimes occurs where he cannot possibly have been in doubt as to the source of his quotation. Testified—that is, in biblical usage 'solemnly declared'; the words are no light exclamation of wonder"—MOULTON.

What is man. "The Hebrew word enosh means man in his weakness and humiliation. The 'what' expresses a double feeling—how mean in himself! how great in Thy love! David twice makes the exclamation, 'What is man?'—once when he is thinking of man's frailty in connection with his exaltation by God (Ps. 8); and once (Ps. 144. 3) when he is thinking only of man's emptiness and worthlessness, as being undeserving of God's care. (Comp. Job 7. 17)"—FARRAR.

7. "Thou hast made him—Adam—a little lower than the angels. The Hebrew is, 'a little lower than' (that is, next to) 'God.' Such was man as he came out of the hands of his Creator; it seems, the highest of all created beings. But these words are also, in a further sense, as the apostle here shows, applicable to the Son of God. It should be remembered that the apostles constantly cited the LXX. translation, very frequently without any variation. It was not their business, in writing to the Jews, who at that time had it in high esteem, to amend or alter this, which would, of consequence, have occasioned disputes without end"—WESLEY.

"There is one in whom the Divine purpose is fulfilled in all its parts. He was made a little (the rendering of the margin, 'a little while' is much less probable) lower than angels, and He is crowned with glory. In one point we note an apparent departure from the sense of the Psalm, since the words a little lower, which there denote dignity, here denote humiliation. This difference is not essential; in each case it is the position of man that is signified, and our Lord's assumption of human nature must in any case be spoken of as a descent to a lower sphere. There is a peculiar fitness in the use of the human name, Jesus, for Him in whom the Psalmist's words concerning man are literally fulfilled"—MOULTON.

8. "Now this putting all things under Him implies that there is nothing that is not put under Him. But it is plain this is not done now, with regard to man in general"—WESLEY.

"Thou hast put—rather 'Thou didst put' by one eternal decree. This clause should be added to the last verse. The clause applies, not to Christ (as in 1 Cor. 15. 25), but to man in his redeemed glory. All things. This is defined in the Psalm (8. 7, 8) to mean specially the animal world, but is here applied to the universe in accordance with its messianic application. (Matt. 28. 18.) For. The 'for' continues the reasoning of ver. 5. The writer with deep insight seizes upon the juxtaposition of 'humiliation' and 'dominion,' as a paradox which only found in Christ its full solution. He left nothing that is not put under Him. The inference intended to be drawn is not 'and therefore even angels will be subject to man,' but 'and therefore the control of angels will come to an end.' When, however, we read such a passage as 1 Cor. 6. 3, 'know ye not that we shall judge angels?' it is uncertain whether the author would not have admitted even the other inference. But now—i.e. 'but in this present earthly condition of things' man is not as yet supreme. We see as a fact man's humiliation; we perceive by faith the glorification of Jesus, and of all humanity in Him. Under him—i.e. under man"—FARRAR.

9. "It is done only with regard to Jesus, God-Man, who is now crowned with glory and honour—as a reward for His having suffered death. He was made a little lower than the angels—who cannot either suffer or die. That by the grace of God, He might taste death—an expression denoting both the reality of His death and the shortness of its continuance. For every man—that ever was or will be born into the world"—WESLEY.

In accordance with the order of the original, the verse should be rendered, But we look upon Him who has been, for a little while, made low in comparison of angels—even Jesus—on account of the suffering of death, crowned, etc. Who was made a little lower than the angels. This alludes to the temporal ("for a little while") and voluntary humiliation of the incarnate Lord. (See Phil. 2. 7-11.) For a short time Christ was liable to agony and death from which angels are exempt; and even to the "intolerable indignity" of the grave. For the suffering of death—rather, "because of the suffering of death." The vitâ crucis was the appointed vitâ lucis. (Comp. ch. 5. 7–10; 7. 26; 9. 12.) This truth—that the sufferings of Christ were the willing path of His perfectionment as the "Priest upon His throne" (Zech. 6. 13)—is brought out more distinctly in this than in any other Epistle. WATSON adds: "to die for us must be understood to mean in the place and stead of man, as a sacrificial oblation, by which satisfaction is made for the sins of the individual, so that they become remissible upon the terms of the evangelical covenant. When, therefore, it is said that Christ, by the grace of God tasted death for every man, it can only be fairly concluded from such a declaration, and from many other familiar texts, in which the same phraseology is employed, that, by the death of Christ, the sins of every man are rendered remissible, and that salvation is consequently attainable by every man." "There is an apparent difficulty in the position of the last clause of the verse, 'that He should taste death for every man.' We cannot doubt that these words depend on those which immediately precede; and yet how can it be said that Jesus has been crowned with glory in order that He may 'taste death for every man'? Almost all difficulty is removed if we consider that (to use Dean Alford's words) 'it is on the triumphant issue of His sufferings that their efficacy depends.' But it is impossible for the Christian to separate, even in thought, the one from the other—the sufferings from the certain triumph. We might, perhaps, say that it is only by a misuse of human analogies that we separate them even in time: in the Gospel of S. John, at all events (if not in this very Epistle—see ver. 14), we are taught that in His crucifixion Jesus is exalted. This clause, then, brings us back to the thought of the glory reserved for man; through death the fulfilment of God's purpose might seem to be frustrated; through the death of Jesus on behalf of every man (1 Pet. 3. 18) it is fulfilled" —MOULTON.

10. "In this verse the apostle expresses, in his own words, what he expressed before in those of the psalmist. It became Him—it was suitable to all His attributes, both to His justice, goodness, and wisdom. For whom—as their ultimate end. And by whom—as their first clause—are all things in bringing many adopted sons to glory—to this very thing, that they are sons, and are treated as such. To perfect the Captain—Prince, leader, and author of their salvation by His atoning sufferings for them. To 'perfect' or consummate implies the bringing Him to a full and glorious end of all His troubles. (Heb. 5. 9.) This consummation by suffering intimates (1) the glory of Christ, to whom being consummated, all things are made subject; (2) the preceding sufferings. Of these he treats expressly (vers. 11-18); having before spoken of His glory, both to give an edge to his exhortation, and to remove the scandal of sufferings and death. A fuller consideration of both these points he interweaves with the following discourse on His priesthood. But what is here said of our Lord's being 'made perfect through sufferings,' has no relation to our being saved or sanctified by sufferings. Even He Himself was perfect, as God and as man, before ever He suffered. By His sufferings, in His life and death, He was made a perfect or complete sin-offering. But unless we were to be made the same sacrifice, and to atone for sin, what is said of Him in this respect is as much out of our sphere as His ascension into heaven. It is His atonement, and His Spirit carrying on 'the work of faith with power' in our hearts, that alone can sanctify us. Various afflictions, indeed, may be made subservient to this; and so far as they are blessed to the weaning us from sin, and causing our affections to be set on things above, so far they do indirectly help on our sanctification"—WESLEY.

"For—what seemed to Jews incredible, that the Christ should die, was ordained 'by the grace of God.' For thus to make sufferings the path to His kingdom was worthy of God, for whose glory and through whose power all things exist; who as Creator commands all agencies, and who cannot but do that which will subserve His glory. If the means at which men wondered were chosen by God, no one may doubt their supreme fitness for the end. In what this fitness consisted the following words partially explain. In bringing. It is doubtful whether the Greek word should not be rendered, 'having brought.' With this translation we must certainly explain the words on the same principle as the past tenses of vers. 7 and 8. As in the Divine counsels all things were subjected to man, with the same propriety it may be said that God had brought many sons to glory when the Saviour suffered and died. Many sons. The new thought here introduced is of great importance in the argument. The Divine purpose is to bring many sons (comp. ch. 1. 14) unto glory—the glory already spoken of as reserved for man—through His Son, who has Himself received this glory that He may make it theirs. Captain. This word occurs in three other places. In Acts 5. 31 it bears its original meaning, 'Leader' ('a Leader and a Saviour'); in ch. 12. 2 and Acts 3. 15 the idea of 'leading the way' has passed into that of origination"—MOULTON. "The term Captain means leader, then originator to others; in many cases the idea that the leader shares in that to which he leads others falls away, and the word merely means 'author.' To make perfect does not mean to endow with all excellent qualities, but to bring to the end, that is, the appropriate or appointed end, the end corresponding to the idea. What this end is in any case will be suggested from that which is made perfect. Here it is the Author of salvation, or, as He is called (ver. 11), the Sanctifier. To make Him perfect will be to bring Him into that condition in which He is ideally complete as the Author of salvation and Sanctifier. Coming so near 'crowned with glory' (ver. 9), and in the whole connection of chaps. 1, 2, 'perfection' describes the Son's supreme place in the economy of salvation. It became . . . bringing many sons, etc. What it befitted God to do was not, of course, to bring many sons to glory—such a statement did not need to be made: nor yet to make the Son the Captain of salvation—the fitness of this hardly required a special emphasis; but to make the Son, the Author of salvation, perfect through the suffering of death—and yet not this simply; what befitted God was to make perfect the Author of salvation through sufferings, bringing (or when He brought) at the same time many sons to glory. The fitness was in God, Him on account of whom and through whom all things are. The act befitting Him was to make the Author of salvation perfect through sufferings. This was befitting when He brought many sons to glory. The ground of the fitness, so far as it is expressed, lay in the relation of this act to the other act, 'bringing,' etc. 'Many' is not used in opposition to 'all,' but states positively that the sons are many, and thus perhaps adds a shade of confirmation to the fitness"—DAVIDSON.

11. For—"they are nearly related to each other—He that sanctifieth—Christ (Heb. 13. 12)—and all they that are sanctified—that are brought to God; that draw near or come to Him, which are synonymous terms—are all of one—partakers of one nature, from one parent, Adam"—WESLEY.

For—the next three verses are an illustration of the moral fitness, and therefore of the Divine necessity, that there should be perfect unity and sympathy between the Saviour and the saved. Both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified. The idea would perhaps be better, though less literally, expressed by "both the Sanctifier and the sanctified," for the idea of sanctification is here not so much that of progressive holiness as that of cleansing (ch. 13. 12). This writer seems to make but little difference between the words "to sanctify" and "to purify," because in the sphere of the Jewish Ceremonial Law, from which his analogies are largely drawn, "sanctification" meant the setting apart for service by various means of purification. (See ch. 9. 13, 14; 10. 10, 14; 13. 12, and comp. John 17. 17–19; 1 John 1. 7.) Are all of one—of one Father. This is the connecting link between ver. 11 and ver. 10 which speaks of the "many sons" and their Saviour. Though His Sonship is unique and infinitely exalted, He is not ashamed to own them as brethren.

12. I will declare Thy name to My brethren. "Christ declares the name of God, gracious and merciful, plenteous in goodness and truth, to all who believe, that they also may praise Him. In the midst of the Church will I sing praise unto Thee—as the precentor of the choir. This He did literally, in the midst of His apostles, on the night before His passion. And as it means, in a more general sense, setting forth the praise of God, He has done it in the church by His word and His Spirit; He still does, and will do it throughout all generations"—WESLEY.

"Vers. 12, 13 contain passages from Old Testament prophecy in which the relations of the Sanctifier and those sanctified in common to God, and the Son's consciousness of them are expressed. (1) These passages are here regarded as directly prophetic, expressing by anticipation the relation of the Son to those whom He saves, and their common relation to God. That conception of prophecy which we express by the term 'typical' does not seem anywhere entertained in the Epistle. (2) The question, When is the Son supposed to use these words regarding Himself and men? is quite unimportant, and was probably not before the writer's mind. The quotations are adduced, as usual (see on ch. 1. 5), simply for the sake of the relations which they express. They exhibit the Son entering into His actual vocation as Saviour" — DAVIDSON. I will declare Thy name, etc. The quotation is taken (with very slight variation) from ver. 22 of Ps. 22.—a Psalm remarkable for its close connection with the narratives of the passion of our Lord. DELITZSCH adds: "The author of this Epistle has a perfect right to assume that David is speaking here as a type of Christ—nay, that the Spirit of Christ is speaking in him, and so Christ Himself selecting David's trials and sufferings as symbols of His own. The Psalm is, therefore, both typical and prophetic, and it admits of no doubt that the writers of the New Testament allow themselves to quote utterances of typical Old Testament personages concerning themselves as utterances and words of Christ."

13. And again—"as one that has communion with His brethren in sufferings, as well as in nature, He says, I will put my trust in Him—to carry Me through them all. And again—with a like acknowledgment of His near relation to them, as younger brethren, who were yet but in their childhood, He presents all believers to God, saying, Behold I and the children whom Thou hast given Me"—WESLEY.

I will put my trust in Him . . . Behold I and the children, etc. "Of the two passages cited in this verse, the latter is certainly from Isa. 8. 18; and though the former might be derived from 2 Sam. 22. 3 or Isa. 12. 2, yet, as the words are also found in the same chapter of Isaiah (8. 17), we may with certainty consider this the source of the quotation. That the section of Isaiah's prophecies to which ch. 8 belongs is directly messianic, is a fact that must be kept in mind; but the stress of the quotation cannot be laid on this, The prophet, as the representative of God to the people, has given utterance to the Divine message: in these words, however, 'I will put my trust' (better 'I will have my trust,' for continuous confidence is what the words denote) 'in Him,' he retires into the same position with the people whom he has addressed; their relation towards God's word and the hope it inspires must be his also. This twofold position of the prophet symbolised the twofold nature of Him of whom every prophet was a type"—MOULTON.

14. Since then these children partake of flesh and blood—"of human nature with all its infirmities—He also in like manner took part of the same; that through His own death He might destroy the tyranny of him that had, by God's permission, the power of death with regard to the ungodly. Death is the devil's servant and sergeant, delivering to him those whom he seizes in sin. That is, the devil—the power as manifest to all; but who exerted it, they saw not"—WESLEY.

Forasmuch then, etc. "The two members of this verse directly recall the thoughts of vers. 9. and 10. (1) It was the will of God that salvation should be won by the Son for sons; (2) This salvation could only be won by means of death. The children—said with reference to ver. 13. Flesh and blood—lit. 'blood and flesh,' the familiar order of the words being departed from here and in Eph. 6. 12. This designation of human nature on its material side is found four times in the New Testament, and is extremely common in Jewish writers. The emphasis of the following statement is noteworthy, 'He Himself also in like manner took part of the same things.' His assumption of our nature had for its object suffering and death. Destroy him—rather, 'bring him to nought'; annul his power. The comment on these words will be found in ch. 9. 15, 26; for it was as the lord of sin, which was the cause (Rom. 5. 12) and the sting (1 Cor. 15. 56) of death, that the devil held dominion over death (or, as the words might mean, wielded the power possessed by death). (Comp. 2 Tim. 1. 10; 1 John 3. 8; also Rev. 1. 18.) Combined with this is the thought which runs through this chapter—the assimilation of the Redeemer to the redeemed in the conditions of His earthly life. By meeting death Himself, He vanquishes and destroys death for them"—MOULTON. That is, the devil. This is the only place in this Epistle in which the name "devil" occurs. It is nowhere very frequent in the New Testament. The English reader is liable to be misled by the rendering "devils" for "demons" in the Gospels. Satan has the power of death, if that be the meaning here, not as lord, but as executioner (comp. Rev. 9. 11); his power is only a permissive power (John 8. 44; Rev. 12. 10).

15. And deliver them, as many as through fear of death were all their lifetime, till then, subject to bondage. Every man who fears death is subject to bondage, is in a slavish, uncomfortable state. And every man fears death more or less, who knows not Christ: death is unwelcome to him, if he knows what death is. But He delivers all true believers from this bondage"—WESLEY.

Deliver them who through fear of death, etc. "This verse brings into relief the former misery and the present freedom. We may well suppose these words to have been prompted by the intense sympathy of the writer with the persecuted and tempted Christians whom he addresses. He writes throughout as one who never forgets their need of sympathetic help, and who knows well the power of the motives, the allurements, and the threats employed to lead them into apostasy. The crushing power of the 'fear of death' over those who had not grasped the truth that, in Christ, life and immortality are brought to light, perhaps no thought of ours can reach"—MOULTON.

16. For verily He taketh not hold of angels—"He does not take their nature upon Him. But He taketh hold of the seed of Abraham—He takes human nature upon Him. S. Paul says 'the seed of Abraham,' rather than the seed of Adam, because to Abraham was the promise made"—WESLEY.

"The rendering of the margin approaches very nearly the true meaning of the verse. Having spoken in ver. 14 of our Lord's assumption of human nature, the writer in these words assigns the reason. Though the words take hold, which occur twice in the verse, probably cannot directly signify help (as is often maintained), they distinctly suggest laying hold for the sake of giving help: and a beautiful illustration may be found in some of the Gospel narratives of our Lord's work of healing. (Mark 8. 23; Luke 14. 4)"—MOULTON.

17. Wherefore it behoved Him—"it was highly fit and proper, yea necessary, in order to His design of redeeming them—to be made in all things — that essentially pertain to human nature, and in all sufferings and temptations—like His brethren. This is a recapitulation of all that goes before: the sum of all that follows is added immediately. That He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest—'merciful' toward sinners; 'faithful' toward God. A priest or high priest is one who has a right of approaching God, and of bringing others to Him. 'Faithful' is treated of, ch. 3. 2, etc., with its use; 'merciful,' ch. 4. 15, etc., with the use also; 'High Priest,' ch. 5. 4, etc.; 7. 1, etc. The use is added from ch. 10. 19. In things pertaining to God, to expiate the sins of the people—offering up their sacrifices and prayers to God; deriving God's grace, peace, and blessings upon them"—WESLEY.

Wherefore — "since it is 'the seed of Abraham,' His brethren, that He would help. In all things. These words must be taken with made like. In all respects (the single exception does not come into notice here, see ch. 4. 15) He must be made like to 'the brethren' (a reference to ver. 12); like them, He must be liable to, and must suffer, temptation, sorrow, pain, death. That He might be —rather, 'that He might prove or become' (the words imply what is more fully expressed in ch. 5. 8)—a compassionate and faithful High Priest. The high priest was the representative of men to God; without such likeness (see ch. 5. 1, 2) He could be no true High Priest for man"—MOULTON. "Merciful means compassionate; the shade of meaning belonging to 'mercy' in modern English of sparing the guilty, formed no part of its old sense. Faithful is said of the high priest's relation to God rather than to men: see ch. 3. 2-6, where 'faithful' is again taken up. Faithfulness to the duties of the office toward God is mainly compassion towards men. Calvin's saying that Christ did not need to go through sufferings in order to become pitiful, but His doing so was necessary for us that we might be assured of His pity, is hardly just to the scope of the passage. To make reconciliation—rather, 'to make propitiation.' His becoming a merciful and faithful High Priest enabled Him to offer for the people with a right mind. See on ch. 5. 1, etc.—the people are again the seed of Abraham, the historical people of God, for the covenants are continuous"—DAVIDSON.

18. For in that He hath suffered being tempted Himself, He is able to succour them that are tempted—"that is, He has given a manifest, demonstrative proof that He is able so to do"—WESLEY.

For. "The necessity of being 'in all things made like to His brethren' has been shown from the nature of the case; it is now illustrated from the result. The 'brethren' and the 'people' of ver. 17 are here the tempted. Through the temptations arose those sins of the people for which He makes propitiation. In His having been tempted lies His special ability to help the tempted, by His sympathy, by His knowledge of the help that is needed, by the position of High Priest which He has gained through suffering. It is difficult to decide between two translations of the first words of the verse—(1) 'In that He Himself,' (2) 'Wherein He Himself hath suffered being tempted.' The former is simpler, but perhaps less natural as a rendering of the Greek. The latter may indeed at first seem to set a bound to our Lord's ability to help, but with the recollection of the infinitude of His life (comp. John 21. 25) all such limitation disappears"—MOULTON. "Christ has endured every conflict of temptation, and His experience moves His compassion, and His compassion engages His prayers; and where He has promised us His prayers, we may promise ourselves the success"—SOUTH.

CHAPTER III.

Ch. 3—ch. 4. 13. Having, therefore, this High Priest over the house of God—a faithful Son exalted above Moses the faithful servant—let us by faithfulness make sure our calling to be God's sons; that we may not, like those who through their disobedience in the wilderness provoked the Lord, be excluded from the promised rest.

1. The heavenly calling. "God calls from heaven, and to heaven, by the gospel. Consider the Apostle—the Messenger of God, who pleads the cause of God with us—and High Priest—who pleads our cause with God. Both are contained in the one word Mediator. He compares Christ, as an Apostle, with Moses; as a Priest, with Aaron. Both these offices, which Moses and Aaron severally bore, He bears together, and far more eminently. Of our profession—the religion we profess"—WESLEY.

Wherefore. "The address which here begins (the first direct address in the Epistle), bears the same relation to all that has preceded, as ch. 2. 1-4 bears to the first chapter. In particular, the contents of the second chapter are gathered up in this verse, almost every word of which recalls some previous statement or result. Holy brethren—united in one brotherhood in virtue of a common sonship (ch. 2. 10) and of a common brotherhood (ch. 2. 11) with Jesus, Him 'that sanctifieth' (ch. 2. 11). Partakers—through Him who 'took part' of our earthly nature (ch. 2. 14) we are partakers of a 'heavenly calling' as God's sons"—MOULTON. The Apostle and High Priest, etc. Here only is the name Apostle directly given to our Lord; but the thought is present in ch. 2. 3, and in the many passages in which Jesus designates Himself as the Sent of God, using the word from which "Apostle" is derived. (John 3. 17; 17. 18; 20. 21.) There is very little difference between "Apostle" and "Prophet," thus applied; but the one brings into relief the mission, the other the office and position. Each presents a thought complementary of that contained in High Priest. BENGEL says: "As Apostle, Jesus pleads the cause of God with us; as High Priest, He pleads our cause with God. True; but it is God that has appointed Him to be High Priest (ch. 5. 4), and it is to Him that He is faithful, not to us (ch. 2. 17; 3. 2), for faithfulness to Him is compassion to us (ch. 2. 17; 5. 1, 2). 'Our confession' is not whom we confess; nor yet quite, who is the substance or contents of our confession; but, who holds the place of Apostle and High Priest in our confession—where our is emphatic in opposition to the confession of Israel in which Moses held the same place. Christ is not regarded in this Epistle as He is in the Pauline Epistles as the direct object of faith; this is the promises or in general the word of God; see on ch. 11. 1. The words, as also Moses, etc., are virtually a quotation from Num. 12. 7, 'My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all Mine house.' Jesus does not come behind Moses in faithfulness, and with Hebrews to say this was to say much. It is the appointment or sphere in which He is faithful that raises Him above Moses. This is not yet named."

2. His house—"the Church of Israel, then the peculiar family of God"—WESLEY.

Who was faithful—"lit. 'being faithful,' i.e. as Cranmer excellently rendered it, 'how that He is faithful.' The word is suggested by the following contrast between Christ and Moses, of whom it had been said, 'My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all Mine house' (Num. 12. 7). To Him that appointed Him—lit. 'To Him that made Him.' There can be little doubt that the expression means, as in the A.V., 'to Him that made Him such,' i.e. made Him an Apostle and High Priest. For the phrase is doubtless suggested by 1. Sam. 12. 6, where the LXX. has 'He that made Moses and Aaron' (A.V. 'advanced'). Comp. Mark 3. 14, 'and He made twelve, that they should be with Him.' Acts 2. 36, 'God made Him Lord and Christ.' The rendering 'appointed' is therefore a perfectly faithful one"—C. B.

3. He that hath builded it hath more glory than the house—"than the family itself, or any member of it"—WESLEY.

It is not said that Jesus is the Builder; but the relation in which He stands to the Builder of the house is compared with that of Moses to the house. (See vers. 5 and 6.) The meaning of the word builded is, He who prepared or formed the house, with all its necessary parts and arrangements.

4. "Now Christ, He that built not only this house, but all things, ■ God—and so infinitely greater than Moses or any creature"—WESLEY.

For every house is builded by some man—"rather, 'by some one': the thought of the house leads at once to the thought of the builder of it. The meaning of the several parts of this verse is very simple; but it is not easy to follow the reasoning with certainty. The second clause seems to be a condensed expression of this thought, 'But He that built this house is He that built all things, God.' Moses is possessed of lesser glory than the Apostle of our confession, as the house stands below its maker in honour. For this house, like every other, has its Maker;—it is He who made all things, even God"—MOULTON.

5. And Moses verily—"another proof of the pre-eminence of Christ above Moses—was faithful in all his house, as a servant, for a testimony of the things which were afterwards to be spoken—that is, which was a full confirmation of the things which he afterward spake concerning Christ"—WESLEY.

"The contrast is the same as that between Christ and the angels: Christ is Son, heir of the world to come, the angels are ministering spirits in the sphere of salvation; Christ is Son over the house of God, Moses was a servant within it. Christ is heir of the worlds as Son, the dignity is conformable to the relation; so He is over the house as Son; and in both cases, because He was God's agent in making that over which He has been appointed Head. The point of agreement between Moses and Christ is faithfulness; the points of contrast are two: Moses was faithful as a servant, and as servant implies within the house; Christ is faithful as a Son, and the Son must be over the house. The glory or honour of each is not something distinct from their respective positions, but just these respective positions themselves. Though a servant, Moses' trust extended to all God's house"—DAVIDSON.

6. "But Christ was faithful as a Son; whose house we are, while we hold fast, and shall be unto the end, if we hold fast our confidence in God, and glorying in His promises; our faith and hope"—WESLEY.

But Christ as a Son over His own house—"rather, 'over His house.' Throughout this passage (vers. 2, 5, 6) 'His house' must be taken in the sense of the quotation, as the house of God. Whereas Moses was faithful as a servant in this house of God, Christ was faithful as ■ Son set over His Father's house. The antithesis is complete: the one is a servant for witness, the other a Son having a natural right to rule. The concluding words in ver. 5 have no formal answer here, but the contrast is not the less distinctly expressed. The name Christ (which here occurs for the first time) is in this Epistle never a mere name; it contains implicitly the thought that all that to which Moses bore witness has reached its fulfilment now. Christ has come: God's house, formerly typified by Israel, is now manifested as it really is, containing all 'sons' whom God leads to glory (ch. 2. 10). The terms applied by constant usage to the one nation are thus successively enlarged: the 'seed of Abraham' (ch. 2. 16), 'the people' (ch. 2. 17), the 'house of God' (see ch. 10. 21)"—MOULTON. The rejoicing of the hope—rather, the "glorying of our hope." The Greek word means "an object of boasting," as in Rom. 4. 2; 1 Cor. 5. 6, etc. EBRARD says: "The poor Christians had nothing of which to boast but the glory which they hoped to receive. Since that period the same has been substantially true of Christians. Hence, it is their duty now, as it was then, to hold fast the hope in which they glory."

7. Wherefore—"seeing He is faithful, be not ye unfaithful"—WESLEY.

To-day if ye will hear His voice. "The meaning of the Hebrew words is either (1) 'To-day, oh that ye would hearken to (that is, "obey") His voice!' or, (2) 'To-day if ye hearken to His voice.' The 'voice' is that which speaks in the following verses. As the words stand before us, the Psalmist does not formally complete the sentence here commenced ('if ye shall hear'). He introduces the Divine words of warning, but adds none in his own person. The entreaty, 'Harden not your hearts,' is at once the utterance of the Divine voice and the expression of his own urgent prayer. Other passages in which the hardening of the heart is spoken of as the work of man himself are Ex. 9. 34; 1 Sam. 6. 6; Prov. 28. 14"—MOULTON.

8. As in the provocation—"when Israel provoked Me by their strife and murmurings. In the day of temptation—when at the same time they tempted Me, by distrusting My power and goodness"—WESLEY.

Harden not your hearts. "(Comp. Acts 19. 9.) Usually God is said to harden man's heart (Ex. 7. 3, etc.; Isa. 63. 17; Rom. 9. 18), an anthropomorphic way of expressing the inevitable results of neglect and of evil habit. But that this is man's own doing and choice is always recognised (Deut. 10. 16; 2 Kings 17. 14, etc.). As in the provocation—lit. 'In the embitterment.' The LXX. here seem to have read Marah (which means 'bitter') for Meribah, which, in Ex. 17. 1–7, they render by 'reproach.' This is not, however, certain, for though the substantive does not occur again, the verb 'I embitter' is frequently used of provoking God to anger. For the story of Meribah, see Num. 20. 7–13. In the day of temptation—rather, 'of the temptation,' i.e. at Massah (Ex. 17. 7; Deut. 6. 16), although the allusion might also be to Num. 14"—FARRAR.

9. When your fathers—"that hard-hearted and stiff-necked generation. So little cause had their descendants to glory in them—tempted Me—whether I could and would help them—proved Me—put My patience to the proof, even while they saw My glorious works both of judgment and mercy, and that for forty years"—WESLEY.

"According to our best MSS. this verse will run thus: Where (or, 'wherewith') your fathers tempted by trial, and saw My works forty years. The meaning of the Hebrew is, 'Where your fathers tempted Me, proved Me; also saw My work'"—MOULTON.

10. Wherefore—"to speak after the manner of men—I was grieved—displeased, offended with that generation, and said, They always err in their hearts—they are led astray by their stubborn will and vile affections. And—for this reason, because wickedness has blinded their understanding—they have not known My ways—by which I would have led them like a flock—into My rest—in the promised land"—WESLEY.

I was grieved with that generation—"rather, 'I was angry with this generation.' The Hebrew is very strong, 'I loathed a (whole) generation.' The first word, Wherefore, is not found in the Psalm, but is added to make the connection more distinct. And they have not known My ways — better, 'yet they took not knowledge of My ways.' Although throughout the forty years He had shown to them their disobedience and His displeasure, yet the warning and discipline were fruitless. They gained no knowledge of His ways. It is very important to observe this explicit reference to the close, as well as the beginning of the forty years. (See ver. 8)"—MOULTON.

11. So—"rather, 'as' (ch. 4. 3). It is with these as it was with their fathers, the generations that came out of Egypt (Num. 14. 21–24), unto whom God sware, 'They shall not enter into My rest.' The form in which these words appear below (ch. 4. 3, 5) in the A.V., 'If they shall enter into My rest,' is an imitation of the original construction. Into My rest—into the land where Jehovah shall give rest to His people and shall dwell with them. (See Deut. 12. 9; 1 Kings 8. 56; Ps. 132. 14; Isa. 66. 1; 1 Chron. 6. 31; 2 Chron. 6. 41)"—MOULTON.

12. Take heed, lest there be in any of you—"as there was in them—an evil heart of unbelief—unbelief is the parent of all evil, and the very essence of unbelief lies in departing from God, as the living God—the fountain of all our life, holiness, happiness"—WESLEY.

Take heed, brethren, lest there be. "It is evident that deep anxiety mixes with the warning. In any of you. The warning is expressed indefinitely; but if the Epistle was addressed to a small Hebrew community, the writer may have had in view some special person who was in danger. (Comp. chaps. 10. 25; 12. 15.) In any case the use of the singular might lead to individual searching of hearts. He here begins a homily founded on the quotation from the Psalms. An evil heart of unbelief. Unbelief has its deep source in the heart more often perhaps than in the mind. In departing—lit. 'in the apostatising from.' In that one word—apostasy—the moral peril of his Hebrew readers was evidently summed up. To apostatise after believing is more dangerous than not to have believed at all. From the living God. The epithet is not idle. It conveys directly the warning that God would not overlook the sin of apostasy, and indirectly the thought that Christ was in heaven at the right hand of God"—C. B.

13. But, to prevent it, exhort one another, while it is called To-day. "This 'to-day' will not last for ever. The day of life will end soon, and perhaps the day of grace yet sooner"—WESLEY.

Exhort one another. The verb implies the mutually strengthening intercourse of consolation and moral appeal. While it is called To-day—i.e. while our "day of visitation" lasts, and while we still "have the light." (Luke 19. 44; John 12. 35, 36.) Be hardened. The following clause indicates that God only "hardens" the heart, in the sense that man is inevitably suffered to render his own heart callous by indulgence in sin. This state of obdurateness is not always reached by one leap, and through intentional wickedness, but quite as often through being deceived and self-deception.

14. For we are made partakers of Christ—"and we shall still partake of Him and all His benefits, if we hold fast our faith unto the end. If—but not else; and a supposition made by the Holy Ghost is equal to the strongest assertion. Both the sentiment and the manner of expression are the same as ver. 6"—WESLEY.

For—take heed (ver. 12) lest there be anything that may lead astray — we have become partakers of the Christ if (and only if) we hold the beginning of our confidence firm unto the end"—MOULTON.

15. To-day if ye will hear His voice. "There are times wherein God parleys with the soul, and inclines it to the happy surrender."

16. Were they not all that came out of Egypt—"an awful consideration! The whole elect people of God (a very few excepted) provoked God presently after their great deliverance, continued to grieve His Spirit for forty years, and perished in their sin!"—WESLEY.

For some when . . . howbeit not all—rather, "for who were they that when they heard did provoke? Nay, was it not all?" The verse like the following must be taken interrogatively. The sharp interrogations set the progressive downfall of Israel vividly before the Hebrews. Israel and they are alike in both having heard (ver. 7; 4. 2); Israel when they heard provoked; and the danger of falling into the same example (ch. 4. 11) is seen from the fact that Israel's defection was universal, and that it happened when the memory of their deliverance from Egypt was fresh.

17. But . . . grieved—rather, "and . . . wroth." The next step.

18. That believed not, etc. — "rather, 'obeyed not.' The third step"—DAVIDSON.

19. So we see they could not enter in—"though afterward they desired it"—WESLEY.

So we see—or "and we see." The words are not an inference, rather a statement in the historical chain, though expressing the last link of it. They form the transition to ch. 4, stating that Israel failed to enter in because of unbelief, and implying that the rest of which they came short is still left. This last idea, with the accompanying exhortation not to come short of the rest that is left, forms the substance of the following passage (ch. 4. 1–13).

CHAPTER IV.

THIS chapter is manifestly a continuation of the last, and should not have been detached from it. As with the exhortation of ch. 3. 12, 13, are interwoven some of the early words of the quotation from Ps. 95, so here the later thoughts of the same passage are taken up and applied.

1. Let us therefore fear. "The emphasis rests upon 'fear,' not upon 'us.' It is noteworthy that the writer begins with 'Let us,' though about to write 'let any of you'; he will have gained his object if he brings his readers to share his fear. Lest a promise being left us—rather, 'lest haply, a promise being (still) left.' No word must be inserted here that can diminish the generality of the words; in the sequel the statement will be repeated with all possible clearness. Here it is simply said that such a promise remains unexhausted, waiting for complete fulfilment. No Hebrew Christian would doubt this. As in ch. 1, the writer's aim is not to establish a truth absolutely new, but to show that in this and in that scripture a received truth lies contained. Most of our earlier versions (following Luther and Erasmus) give to this clause a different turn, which cannot be correct, 'Lest any of you by forsaking the promise of entering in His rest'"—MOULTON.

2. But the word which they heard did not profit them—"so far from it, that it increased their damnation. It is then only when it is mixed with faith, that it exerts its saving power"—WESLEY.

3. For we only that have believed enter into the rest. "The proposition is, There remains a rest for us. This is proved (vers. 3–11), thus: That Psalm mentions a rest; yet it does not mean—(1) God's rest from creating; for this was long before the time of Moses. Therefore in his time another rest was expected, of which they who then heard fell short. Nor is it (2) the rest which Israel obtained through Joshua; for the Psalmist wrote after him. Therefore it is (3) the eternal rest in heaven. As He said—clearly showing that there is a further rest than that which followed the finishing of the creation. Though the works were finished — before: whence it is plain, God did not speak of resting from them"—WESLEY.

For we which have believed. "The emphasis is twofold, resting both on 'believed' and on 'we enter.' The former looks back to ver. 2, 'by faith'—'for it is we who believed that enter.' The latter looks forward to the remainder of the verse, the purport of which is that the rest exists, and that 'entering into the rest' may still be spoken of. As I have sworn—rather (as above), as 'I sware in My wrath, They shall not enter into My rest.' (See ch. 3. 11.) If in the Scripture (Ps. 95. 8) God warns men of a later age not to imitate the guilt of those whom He excluded from His rest, it follows (see below on ver. 10) that the time for entering into the rest of God was not then past and gone. Although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. And therefore the rest into which God will enter with His redeemed people is not that which succeeded the works of creation"—MOULTON.

4. "For, long after He had rested from His works, He speaks again"—WESLEY.

He spake in a certain place — "rather, 'He hath said somewhere.' By the indefinite 'He' is meant 'God,' a form of citation not used in the same way by S. Paul, but common in Philo and the Rabbis. The 'somewhere' of the original is here expressed in the A.V.

by 'in a certain place,' see note on ch. 2. 6. The reference is to Gen. 2. 2; Ex. 20. 11; 31. 17. The writer always regards the Old Testament not as a dead letter, but as a living voice"—C. B.

5. "In this Psalm, of a rest yet to come"—WESLEY.

6. It remaineth. The promise is still left open, is unexhausted. Because of unbelief—rather, "because of disobedience." It was not the Israelites of the wilderness, but their descendants, who came to Shiloh, and so enjoyed a sort of earthly type of the heavenly rest. (Josh. 18. 1.)

7. After so long a time. "It was above four hundred years from the time of Moses and Joshua to David. As it was said before—S. Paul here refers to the text he had just cited"—WESLEY.

"There is less hope for us each year and day we live in sin. Every hour we are drifting out to sea—the helpless, helmless barque is leaving the lessening shore farther and farther behind. The difficulty of resisting the bad and corrupt passions of our nature grows with man's growth, and strengthens with his strength. Some things become weak, and wear away by use; but not the power of sin"—GUTHRIE.

8. The rest—"all the rest which God had promised"—WESLEY.

For, had the promise been fulfilled in Joshua's conquest, the Psalm (God in the Psalm) would not be speaking of another day, saying, "To-day" (ver. 7)—MOULTON.

9. Therefore—"since he still speaks of another day, there must remain a further, even an eternal, rest for the people of God"—WESLEY.

"There is contained in the rest, a cessation from motion or action; not of all the actions, but of that which hath the nature of a means, and implies the absence of the end. When we have obtained the haven, we have done with the sailing. All motion ends at the centre, and all means cease when we have the end"—BAXTER.

10. For they do not yet so rest—"therefore a fuller rest remains for them"—WESLEY.

"They that enter into God's rest cease from their works as He did from His. The 'works' from which man rests are all the works appointed to him here of God, not merely pains and toils, but the great sum of the task which he is set to accomplish, the result of which he shall carry with him into the rest of God. What that may be even in individuals we cannot know, for who can estimate the fruit of any life? and much less can we surmise what the accumulated gains garnered by mankind shall be. When looking deep into eternity we become blinded by the overpowering glory, and return to the thought that such Sabbath rest is not to be conceived as without work and activity, we are so far right, for God's rest is at the same time an eternal life of infinite activity; but we must be on our guard that our weaknesses do not mix up what is earthly with the heavenly, or open up, even in the city of God itself, a new, long-extended street-view of 'eternal perfectionating.' Rather must we strive with all the power of our spirit to realise the feeling of the true rest, the perfected contentment and satisfaction, which in God has attained to all, and which has to reach nothing more in eternity"—STIER.

11. Lest anyone should fall—"into perdition"—WESLEY.

Labour—"rather, 'give diligence, strive earnestly.' It is the necessity of watchful and constant faithfulness that is enforced"—MOULTON.

12. For the word of God—"preached (ver. 2), and armed with threatenings (ver. 3)—is living and powerful—attended with the power of the living God, and conveying either life or death to the hearers. Sharper than any two-edged sword—penetrating the heart more than this does the body. Piercing—quite through, and laying open—the soul and spirit, joints and marrow—the inmost recesses of the mind, which the apostle beautifully and strongly expresses by this heap of figurative words. And is a discerner—not only of the thoughts, but also of the intentions"—WESLEY.

"The exhortation impressed by reference to the word of God, which offers the rest and warns us against hardening our hearts. The word of God is personified here, and endowed with all the attributes of God Himself, with whom it is identified (ver. 13). The identification, however, is with God, not with the Son, for there is no trace of the personal Word or Logos here. Quick. i.e. 'living,' as in the phrases, the quick and the dead, to cut to the quick, etc. As God is the living God, His word is instinct with His life. It is not separate from Him, but filled out with all His attributes. It remains so, however long it has been spoken, never becoming cold or dead. And powerful—rather, 'active,' working. (Comp. Eph. 1. 11; Phil. 2. 13; Isa. 55. 11.) Life is measured by activity; full life is perfect activity. Sharper . . . sword, a frequent comparison in Scripture. (Comp. Eph. 6. 17; Rev. 1. 16; 2. 12; 19. 15; Isa. 49. 2; Hos. 6. 5.) The two-edged sword, that is, with no back, is naturally thinner and sharper than the ordinary one. Piercing. This is how its activity and sharpness manifest themselves. The Divine word cuts open and lays bare (ver. 13), and exposes in its most secret movements and framework the whole mental nature of man on all its sides"—DAVIDSON.

13. In His sight. "It is God whose word is 'thus powerful'; it is God in whose sight every creature is manifest—and of this His word, working on the conscience, gives the fullest conviction. But all things are naked and opened—plainly alluding to the sacrifices under the Law which were first flayed, and then (as the Greek word literally means) 'cleft asunder through the neck' and backbone; so that everything both without and within was exposed to open view"—WESLEY.

In His sight. God being present in His word as living, active, and judging the thoughts, a transition is made here from the word to Himself. And opened—i.e. "laid open." The word means having the head thrown back and the neck laid bare; it is uncertain, however, to what the allusion is, whether to one overthrown by a wrestler, the meaning being prone, or to the practice of thrusting back the head of criminals to expose their face to the gaze of spectators. "Touched by this word of God, every creature 'returns of force to its own likeness'—shows itself as it is"—MOULTON.

14. Having therefore a great High Priest—"great indeed, being the eternal Son of God, that is passed through the heavens—as the Jewish high priest passed through the veil into the Holy of Holies, carrying with him the blood of the sacrifices, on the yearly day of atonement; so our great High Priest went once for all through the visible heavens, with the virtue of His own blood, into the immediate presence of God"—WESLEY.

Seeing then that we have a great High Priest. "These verses refer back to ch. 2. 17; 3. 1, and form the transition to the long proof and illustration of Christ's superiority to the Levitic priesthood which occupies the Epistle to ch. 10. 18. The writer here reverts to his central thought, to which he has already twice alluded (ch. 2. 17; 3. 1). He had proved that Christ is superior to angels, the ministers, and to Moses, the servant, of the old dispensation, and (quite incidentally) to Joshua. He has now to prove that He is like Aaron, in all that made Aaron's priesthood precious, but infinitely superior to him and his successors, and a pledge to us of the grace by which the true rest can be obtained. Christ is not only a High Priest, but 'a great High Priest'"—C. B. "All the chief points of the earlier chapters are brought together in this verse and the next—the high priests (ch. 2. 17; 3. 1); His exaltation (ch. 1. 3, 4, 13; 2. 9); His Divine Sonship (ch. 1; 3. 6); His compassion towards the brethren whose lot He came to share (ch. 2. 11–18). That is passed into the heavens—rather, 'that hath passed through the heavens.' As the high priest passed through the holy place to enter the Holy of Holies, Jesus 'ascended up far above all heavens,' and sat at the right hand of God. This thought is developed in ch. 8 to 10"—MOULTON.

15. "He sympathises with us even in our innocent infirmities, wants, weaknesses, miseries, dangers. Yet without sin—and, therefore, is indisputably able to preserve us from it in all our temptations"—WESLEY.

"We cannot but note again how the power of the exhortation (especially to those immediately addressed) lay in the combination of the two thoughts—the greatness and the tender compassion of the High Priest of our confession. The two are united in the words of ver. 16, 'the throne of grace.' (Comp. ch. 8. 1.) The beautiful rendering, touched with the feeling of our infirmities, is due to the Genevan Testament of 1557. But was in all points, etc.—better, 'but one that hath in all points been tempted in like manner, apart from sin.' These words show the nature and the limits of this sympathy of Christ. He suffers with His people, not merely showing compassion to those who are suffering and tempted, but taking to Himself a joint feeling of their weaknesses"—MOULTON.

16. Let us therefore come boldly—"without any doubt or fear—unto the throne of God, our reconciled Father, even His throne of grace. Grace erected it, and reigns there, and dispenses all blessings in a way of mere, unmerited favour"—WESLEY.

"Rather, Let us then approach with confidence. The notion of 'approach' to God in the Levitical service (Lev. 21. 17; 22. 3) is prominent in this Epistle (ch. 10. 1–22; 11. 6; 12. 18–22). In S. Paul it only occurs once (1 Tim. 6. 13), and then in a different sense. His ideal of the Christian life is not 'access to God' but 'oneness with Christ.' Boldly—lit. 'with confidence' (ch. 3. 6)"—C. B. Obtain mercy. "The real meaning is, 'receive compassion' (ch. 2. 17) in our weakness and trials. The thought of obtaining 'mercy' for guilt is not in these words, taken by themselves; but grace meets every need. If the last verse brought evidence that our High Priest has perfect knowledge of the help required, this gives the assurance that the help shall be given as needed, and in the time of need"—MOULTON.

CHAPTER V.

1. For every high priest being taken from among men—"is, till he is taken, of the same rank with them—and is appointed—that is, is wont to be appointed—in things pertaining to God—to bring God near to men, and men to God—that he may offer both gifts—out of things inanimate, and animal sacrifices"—WESLEY.

Vers. 1–10 link themselves with the last words of ch. 4. The thoughts which have been briefly expressed in vers. 14, 15, and on which ver. 16 rests, are resumed, and in this section fully developed. Hence ch. 4. 16 is connected both with what precedes (by therefore) and with the present chapter (by For): "For as every human high priest shares the nature of those on behalf of whom he appears before God, and thus can be compassionate towards them, and, moreover, can only receive his appointment from God; so Christ is God-appointed, He has learnt His obedience through sufferings, and, thus made perfect, is declared by God High Priest for ever"—MOULTON. "The author here describes the first essential characteristic of the high priest, according to the ordinances of the Divine laws; and, doing this, proceeds on the assumption, that whatever may characterise the high priest as such, will be found also in Christ"—DELITZSCH.

2. Who can have compassion—"in proportion to the offence; so the Greek word signifies. On the ignorant—them that are in error. And the wandering—them that are in sin. Seeing himself also is compassed with infirmity—even with sinful infirmity; and so needs the compassion which he shows to others"—WESLEY.

"Who can have compassion—lit. 'being able to feel gently towards.' The word expresses the feeling that lies between apathy and undue excitement; here the feeling of moderation or leniency towards others, which is far removed from severity. The ignorant and erring or out of the way are those falling into sins which are to be described as not wilful or done with a high hand, usually called 'sins of ignorance.' Under this head fall not merely sins done inadvertently, but sins into which one may be betrayed by selfishness or passion (Lev. 5. 1; 19. 20–22) or force of circumstances. For such sins the sacrifices were provided. For the other class of sins, those done wilfully and aimed against the covenant itself, there was no sacrifice. The author carries this Old Testament principle over into the new covenant; for rebellion against the covenant itself there is no sacrifice (ch. 10. 26). It seems probable, indeed, that only sins coming under this class of 'errors' are regarded by him as pardonable through sacrifice, and that to this class belong the transgressions under the first covenant (ch. 9. 15) which the offering of the Son redeemed. For that he . . . infirmity. The high priest's own consciousness of infirmity makes him bear gently with the erring"—DAVIDSON.

3. "The law of the day of atonement required a sin-offering of a bullock and a burnt-offering of a ram for the high priest himself, and for the congregation a sin-offering of two he-goats and a burnt-offering of a ram. Over his own sin-offering the high priest made confession of sins, first for himself and his household, then for the priests; over the goat sent into the wilderness, the sins of the people were confessed"—MOULTON.

4. "The apostle begins here to treat of the priesthood of Christ. The sum of what he observes concerning it is, Whatever is excellent in the Levitical priesthood is in Christ, and in a more eminent manner; and whatever is wanting in those priests is in Him. And no one taketh this honour—the priesthood—to himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron—and his posterity, who were all of them called at one and the same time. But it is observable Aaron did not preach at all; preaching being no part of the priestly office"—WESLEY.

Here is a principle:—A man takes the office, not out of personal assumption, but when called of God; and an illustration—the case of Aaron. (Ex. 28. 1.) Were the office arrogated to himself by anyone, the same arrogancy might mark his exercise of it. But God appoints to the office, and the appointment is in behalf of men (ver. 1), and this is security for the fit disposition in the high priest. CLARKE adds: "God Himself appointed the tribe and family out of which the high priest was to be taken, and Aaron and his sons were expressly chosen by God to fill the office of the high priesthood. As God alone had the right to appoint His own priest for the Jewish nation, and man had no authority here; so God alone could provide and appoint a High Priest for the whole human race. Aaron was thus appointed for the Jewish people; Christ, for all mankind."

5. So also Christ glorified not Himself to be an High Priest—"that is, did not take this honour to Himself, but received it from Him who said, Thou art My Son, to-day have I begotten Thee—not, indeed, at the same time; for His generation was from eternity"—WESLEY.

"So also Christ — rather, 'So even the Christ.' Jesus, the Messiah, the true Anointed Priest, possessed both these qualifications. Glorified not Himself. He has already called the high priesthood 'an honour,' but of Christ's priesthood He uses a still stronger word, 'glory' (ch. 2. 9; John 12. 28; 13. 31). But He that said unto Him—God glorified Him, and the writer again offers the admitted messianic prophecies of Ps. 2. 7 and 110. 4, as a sufficient illustration of this. The fact of His Sonship demonstrates that His call to the priesthood was a call of God. Jesus said, 'If I honour Myself, My honour is nothing: it is My Father that honoureth Me; of whom ye say, that He is your God' (John 8. 54)"—C. B.

6. "In another place (Ps. 110. 4). This Psalm was so universally accepted as messianic that the Targum of Jonathan paraphrases the first verse of it, 'The Lord said to His Word.' After the order—'according to the style of.' (Comp. ch. 7. 15, 'after the likeness of Melchisedec.') After the order of Melchisedec. The writer here with consummate literary skill introduces the name Melchisedec, to prepare incidentally for the long argument which is to follow in ch. 7; just as he twice introduces the idea of high priesthood (ch. 2. 17; 3. 1) before directly dealing with it. The reason why the Psalmist had spoken of his ideal theocratic King as a Priest after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron, lies in the words for ever, as subsequently explained"—C. B.

7. "The sum of the things treated of in the seventh and following chapters is contained (vers. 7–10); and in this sum is admirably comprised the process of His passion, with its inmost causes, in the very terms used by the Evangelists. Who in the days of His flesh—those two days, in particular, wherein His sufferings were at the height—having offered up prayers and supplications—thrice—with strong crying and tears—in the garden—to Him that was able to save Him from death—which yet He endured, in obedience to the will of His Father. And being heard in that which He particularly feared—when the cup was offered Him first, there was set before Him that horrible image of a painful, shameful, accursed death, which moved Him to pray conditionally against it; for, if He had desired it, His heavenly Father would have sent Him more than twelve legions of angels to have delivered Him. But what He most exceedingly feared was the weight of infinite justice; the being 'bruised' and 'put to grief' by the hand of God Himself. Compared with this everything else was a mere nothing; and yet, so greatly did He even thirst to be obedient to the righteous will of His Father, and to 'lay down' even 'His life for the sheep,' that He vehemently longed to be baptized with this baptism. (Luke 12. 50.) Indeed, His human nature needed the support of Omnipotence; and for this He sent up 'strong crying and tears'; but, throughout His whole life, He showed that it was not the sufferings He was to undergo, but the dishonour that sin had done to so holy a God, that grieved His spotless soul. The consideration of its being the will of God tempered His fear, and afterwards swallowed it up; and He was 'heard,' not so that the cup should pass away, but so that He drank it without any fear"—WESLEY.

"The following rendering will, it is believed, best show the meaning of this and the following verse, and the connection of the several parts: Who, in the days of His flesh, having with a strong cry and tears offered up prayers and supplications unto Him that was able to save Him out of death, and having been heard for His reverent fear, though He was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which He suffered"—MOULTON. "The statement is: Who in the days of His flesh, though He was a Son, yet learned obedience from the things which He suffered. The 'days of His flesh' means His life upon the earth. Though He was a Son, He learned obedience; this is stated to obviate the very idea of assumption on His part. It is not remarkable that a son should be obedient, and it is not meant that the disposition of obedience was ever wanting to Him. But the disposition had to maintain itself in the face of greater and greater demands upon it. And as He had to meet these demands rising with the rising tide of things which He suffered, He entered ever more deeply into the experience of what obedience was. For the demands could not be met without the resistance and shrinking of His human nature (Matt. 26. 39), and the overcoming of this was an advance in obedience. (Comp. ch. 12. 2.) The progress may perhaps even be seen in Matt. 26. 39 with 42. When the writer says 'learned' obedience, he has no doubt in his mind the contrast between the Son's former state and His state in the days of His flesh, the latter of which, especially on its side of suffering, was to Him a thing wholly new. This was the disposition and demeanour of Jesus while on the way towards that glory of His appointment to which God called Him. The clauses, having offered up prayers . . . and having been heard for His godly fear, illustrate the statement, He learned obedience by the things which He suffered. Here He is seen learning obedience. The example brought forward is, His supreme act of obedience, viz. suffering, death (ch. 10. 5, etc.; Phil 2. 8), and the language of the passage reflects the scene in Gethsemane. The evangelical tradition preserved to us does not mention 'tears'; the oral account heard by the author may have contained this trait, or he may have supposed it included (Matt. 26. 37; Ps. 22. 25); comp. the two accounts of Jacob's wrestling, Gen. 32. 26 and Hos. 12. 4. The strong crying need not necessarily refer to the cry on the cross, though this may be included, the general scene being that of the Son's great, final act of obedience. Then He offered supplications to Him that was able to save Him from death, or, 'out of death.' These words might mean either that he prayed to be saved from dying, or, that He prayed to be delivered out of the power of death, a sense which would admit that He contemplated falling into its power for a time"—DAVIDSON.

8. Though He were a Son. "This is interposed, lest any should be offended at all these instances of human weakness. In the garden, how frequently did He call God His Father! (Matt. 26. 39, etc.) And hence it most evidently appears that His being the Son of God did not arise merely from His resurrection. Yet learned He—the word 'learned,' premised to the word suffered, elegantly shows how willingly He learned. He learned obedience, when He began to suffer; when He applied Himself to drink that cup: obedience in suffering and dying"—WESLEY.

Though He were a Son. "These words may be connected with what precedes (implying that He was heard for His reverent fear, not because, in the pre-eminent sense, He was God's Son); but they are still more closely joined with the following sentence, 'Though He was a Son, He learnt His obedience by the things which He suffered.' 'The disposition of obedience Jesus possessed before He suffered, but the proof that this disposition existed must be shown in deed: this progress from the disposition to the deed of obedience is a practical learning of the virtue of obedience' (Lunemann). The suffering recorded in ver. 7 is

9. And being perfected—"by sufferings (Heb. 2. 10); brought through all to glory. He became the author—the procuring and efficient cause—of eternal salvation to all that obey Him—by doing and suffering His whole will"—WESLEY.

And being made perfect—"having been brought to the goal and consummation in the glory which followed this mediatorial work. (See ch. 2. 10. and comp. Luke 13. 32, 'the third day I shall be perfected.') Salvation unto all them that obey Him. In an author so polished and rhetorical there seems to be an intentional force and beauty in the repetition in this verse of the two leading words in the last. Christ prayed to God who was able to 'save' Him out of death, and He became the cause of 'eternal salvation' from final death; Christ learnt 'obedience' by His life of self-sacrifice, and He became a Saviour to them that 'obey' Him"—C. B.

10. Called. "The Greek word here properly signifies 'surnamed.' His name is, 'the Son of God.' The Holy Ghost seems to have concealed who Melchisedec was, on purpose that he might be the more eminent type of Christ. This only we know—that he was a priest, and king of Salem, or Jerusalem"—WESLEY.

Called—"rather, 'addressed.' The Divine words are, 'Thou art a priest for ever.' In the quotation from the Psalm, 'priest' is now altered into 'High Priest.' The purport remains the same; or, rather, it is by this change of word that the meaning of the Psalm is fully expressed. This repetition of the words of ver. 6 at the close of the paragraph is singularly impressive.

"At this point the course of the argument is interrupted by a long digression (ch. 5. 11 to ch. 6. 20), to which the writer is led by reflection on the inability of his readers to receive the teaching which befits their Christian standing. If, however, we remember the practical aim that is predominant in the Epistle, we can hardly call this a digression, so powerfully is every portion of it made subservient to one great purpose"—MOULTON.

11. Concerning whom. "The apostle here begins an important digression, wherein he reproves, admonishes, and exhorts the Hebrews. We—preachers of the gospel—have many things to say, and hard to be explained—though not so much for the subject-matter, as from your slothfulness in considering, and dulness in apprehending the things of God"—WESLEY.

"Of whom, i.e. not of Melchisedec, but of Christ, 'an High Priest after the order of Melchisedec' (ver. 10). Concerning this subject the author has, first, many things to say—the subject as he has it in his mind is large (it occupies ch. 7. 1 to ch. 10. 18 of the Epistle); and, second, what he has to say is hard to be uttered, or 'hard to interpret,' that is, expound or express in the right way. The reason of this difficulty—seeing ye are dull—rather, 'are become' dull of hearing. The condition was one into which they had fallen. Dulness of hearing is a figure for slowness of understanding. As it is difficult to strike the right tone and key to make a deaf person hear, it was difficult to find such forms of thought and expression as would make their way into the ear of their mind"—DAVIDSON.

12. Ye have need that one teach you again which are the first principles of religion. "Accordingly these are enumerated in the first verse of the ensuing chapter. And have need of milk—the first and plainest doctrines"—WESLEY.

For when for the time ye ought to be teachers—"that is, 'though you ought, by this time, to be teachers, considering how long a time has elapsed since your conversion.' The passage is important as bearing on the date of the Epistle. Ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles—rather, 'ye again have need that some one teach you the rudiments of the beginning of the oracles of God.' It is uncertain whether we should read τινὰ 'that some one teach you,' or τινα 'that (one) teach you which are.' The difference in sense is not great, but perhaps the indefinite 'some one' enhances the irony of a severe remark. For the word 'rudiments,' see Gal. 4. 3, 9. The oracles of God. Here not the Old Testament as in Rom. 3. 2. Such as have need of milk. So the young students or neophytes in the Rabbinic schools were called thinokoth, 'sucklings'"—C. B.

13. Everyone that useth milk—"that neither desires, nor can digest, anything else: otherwise strong men use milk; but not milk chiefly, and much less that only. Is unexperienced in the word of righteousness—the sublimer truths of the gospel. Such are all who desire and can digest nothing but the doctrine of justification and imputed righteousness"—WESLEY.

"The change of expression from 'having need of milk' to partaking of milk (that is, making it the sole food) is significant. Those who are addressed had lost interest in the deeper truths of Christianity, those truths which alone expressed and explained its proper nature. Their temptation apparently was towards mingling a rudimentary Christian doctrine with the teaching of the synagogue. Yielding to this they would lose all real knowledge of the very elements of Christian truth, and with this all true knowledge of the Old Testament itself. The connection between this verse and the last may probably be, 'Ye have come to need milk, for—making it by choice your sole food—ye stand self-confessed as babes'"—MOULTON.

14. But strong meat—"these sublimer truths relating to 'perfection' (Heb. 6. 1) belong to them of full age, who by habit.

Habit here signifies strength of spiritual understanding, arising from maturity of spiritual age. 'By,' or in consequence of, this habit they exercise themselves in these things with ease, readiness, cheerfulness, and profit"—WESLEY.

Ver. 13 expanded the last clause of ver. 12, exposing the condition into which the Hebrews had fallen, which made them unfit to receive the solid food which the apostle desired to offer; ver. 14, by contrast, shows the kind of persons for whom his solid food is suitable—solid food (such as I offer) is for full-grown men. Strong meat. . . . full age; or "solid food is for the full grown"—for such as are not babes, familiar only with milk, but whose organs of sense are exercised through their use of them, and who are able to discern good and evil, that is, what is wholesome and what is injurious. The expressions in this verse are opposed to those in ver. 13—solid food to "milk," full grown to "babes," and senses exercised to "without experience," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

1. Therefore leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ—"that is, saying no more of them for the present. Let us go on to perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works—from open sins, the very first thing to be insisted on. And faith in God—the very next point. So S. Paul in his very first sermon at Lystra (Acts 14. 15), 'Turn from these vanities unto the living God.' And when they believed, they were to be baptized with the baptism, not of the Jews, or of John, but of Christ. The next thing was, to lay hands upon them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: after which they were more fully instructed, touching the resurrection, and the general judgment; called eternal, because the sentence then pronounced is irreversible, and the effects of it remain for ever"—WESLEY.

"Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ — lit. 'leaving the discourse of the beginning of Christ,' i.e. 'getting beyond' the earliest principles of Christian teaching. He does not of course mean that these first principles are to be neglected, still less forgotten, but merely that his readers ought to be so familiar with them as to be able to advance to less obvious knowledge. Let us go on—lit. 'let us be borne along,' as by the current of a stream. He invites his readers to advance with him to doctrines which lie beyond the range of rudimentary Christian teaching. They must come with him out of the limits of this Jewish-Christian catechism. Unto perfection. The 'perfection' intended is the 'full growth' of those who are mature in Christian knowledge (see ch. 5. 14). They ought not to be lingering among the elementary subjects of catechetical instruction which in great measure belonged no less to Jews than to Christians, Not laying again. There is no need for a 'foundation' to be laid a second time. He is not in the least degree disparaging the importance of the truths and doctrines which he tells them to 'leave,' but only urging them to build on those deep foundations the necessary superstructure. The foundation — lit. 'a foundation.' The subjects here alluded to probably formed the basis of instruction for Christian catechumens. They were not, however, exclusively Christian; they belonged equally to Jews, and therefore baptized Christian converts ought to have got beyond them. Repentance from dead works. Repentance is the first lesson of the gospel (Mark 1. 15). 'Dead works' are such as cause defilement, and require purification (ch. 9. 14), because they are sinful (Gal. 5. 19–21), and because their wages is death (Rom. 6. 23); but 'the works of the Law,' as having no life in them (see our Article 13), may be included in the epithet. Faith towards God. This is also one of the initial steps in religious knowledge. How little the writer meant any disparagement of it may be seen from ch. 11. 1, 2, 6"—C. B.

2. The writer specifies four principal objects of instruction: baptism and laying on of hands, which belong to the beginning of the Christian life, and with which are connected the forgiveness of sins and bestowal of gifts of the Holy Spirit, and the resurrection, together with the judgment, in which the life of the Christian Church finds its consummation, and which forms the object of the Christian hope.

3. And this we will do—"we will go on to perfection; and so much the more diligently, because—ver. 4–7"—WESLEY.

And this we will do, if God permit. "There may be some with whom it will be impossible for him thus to press on to maturity of teaching and of Christian experience. There is a case excepted by God Himself from all efforts of the Christian teacher; in this case, though nothing can avail except the laying of a new foundation of repentance, God has appointed no agencies by which such foundation can be laid"—MOULTON.

4. It is impossible for those who were once enlightened—"with the light of the glorious love of God in Christ—and have tasted the heavenly gift—remission of sins, sweeter than honey and the honeycomb—and been made partakers of the Holy Ghost—of the witness and the fruit of the Spirit"—WESLEY.

"For it is impossible. 'For' is based on the words in ver. 3, 'this will we do,' not on 'if God permit,' on which no emphasis falls. The following words read literally, For those once having been enlightened, and having tasted . . . and having become partakers . . . and having tasted . . . and having fallen away, it is impossible to renew again unto repentance. The proposition is; it is impossible to renew again unto repentance those who, having once been enlightened . . . fell away. The passage corresponds in a general way to vers. 1-3. It describes those in whose case a foundation had been laid in teaching, which had been responded to by believing, followed by experiencing, who then had fallen away; and it is affirmed that it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance. The case is put generally, though in a historical form"—DAVIDSON. "It will be seen that the greater part of this long sentence is dependent on the word 'renew' in ver. 6, 'It is impossible to renew again unto repentance those who were once, etc.'"—MOULTON.

5. And have tasted the good word of God—"have had a relish for, and a delight in it—and the powers of the world to come—which everyone tastes, who has a hope full of immortality. Every child that is naturally born, first sees the light, then receives and tastes proper nourishment, and partakes of the things of this world. In like manner, the apostle, comparing spiritual with natural things, speaks of one born of the Spirit, as seeing the light, tasting the sweetness, and partaking of the things 'of the world to come'"—WESLEY.

And have tasted. "The metaphor means 'to partake of,' and 'enjoy,' as in Philo, who speaks of one 'who has quaffed much pure wine of God's benevolent power, and banqueted upon sacred words and doctrines.' The powers of the world to come. Here again it is not easy to see what is exactly intended by 'the powers of the future age.' If the future age be the messianic age, then its 'powers' may be, as S. Chrysostom said, 'the earnest of the Spirit,' or the powers mentioned in ch. 2. 4; Gal. 3. 5. If, on the other hand, it mean 'the world to come,' its 'powers' bring the foretaste of its glorious fruition. It will then be seen that we cannot attach a definitely certain or exact meaning to the separate expressions; on the other hand, nothing can be clearer than the fact that, but for dogmatic prepossessions, no one would have dreamed of explaining them to mean anything less than full conversion"—C. B.

6. And have fallen away. "Here is not a supposition, but a plain relation of fact. The apostle here describes the case of those who have cast away both the power and the form of godliness; who have lost both their faith, hope, and love (ver. 10, etc.), and that wilfully (Heb. 10. 26). Of these wilful total apostates he declares, it is impossible to renew them again to repentance (though they were renewed once), either to the foundation, or anything built thereon. Seeing they crucify the Son of God afresh—they use Him with the utmost indignity—and put Him to an open shame—causing His glorious name to be blasphemed"—WESLEY.

If they shall fall away. "This is one of the most erroneous translations in the A.V. The words can only mean 'and have fallen away.' (Comp. ch. 2. 1; 3. 12; 10. 26, 29), and the position of the participle gives it tremendous force. It was once thought that our translators had here been influenced by theological bias to give such a rendering as should least conflict with their Calvinistic belief in the 'indefectibility of grace' or in 'final perseverance'—i.e. that no converted person, no one who has ever become regenerate, and belonged to the number of 'the elect'—can ever fall away. It was thought that, for this reason, they had put this clause in the form of a mere hypothesis. It is now known, however, that the mistake of our translators was derived from older sources (e.g. Tyndale and the Genevan), and was not due to bias. Calvin was himself far too good a scholar to defend this view of the clause. He attempted to get rid of it by denying that the strong expressions in vers. 4, 5, describe the regenerate. He applies them to false converts or half converts who become reprobate—a view which, as we have seen, is not tenable. The falling away means apostasy, the complete and wilful renunciation of Christianity. To renew them again unto repentance. The verb here used came to mean 'to rebaptize.' The solution of any difficulty is not to be arrived at by tampering with plain words. What the author says is that, 'When those who have tasted the heavenly gift have fallen away, it is impossible to renew them to repentance.' He does not say that the Hebrews have so fallen away; nor does he directly assert that any true convert can thus fall away; but he does say that when such apostasy occurs and — a point of extreme importance which is constantly overlooked—so long as it lasts (see the next clause) a vital renewal is impossible. There can, he implies, be no second 'second birth.' The sternness of the passage is in exact accordance with ch. 10. 26-29 (comp. 2 Pet. 2. 20, 21); but 'the impossibility lies merely within the limits of the hypothesis itself.' Seeing they crucify—rather 'while crucifying,' 'crucifying as they are doing.' Thus the words imply not only an absolute, but a continuous apostasy, for the participle is changed from the past into the present tense. While men continue in wilful and willing sin they preclude all possibility of the action of grace. So long as they cling deliberately to their sins, they shut against themselves the open door of grace. The plain meaning of this passage is, that so long as wilful apostasy continues there is no visible hope for it. The writer is pointing out to Hebrew Christians with awful faithfulness the fatal end of deliberate and insolent apostasy. But we have no right to suppose that he has anything in view beyond the horizon of revealed possibilities. He is thinking of the teaching and ministry of the Church, not of the omnipotence of God. With men it is impossible that a camel should 'go through the eye of a needle,' but with God all things are possible' (Matt. 19. 26; Mark 10. 20-27; Luke 18. 27). In the face of sin—above all of deliberate wretchlessness—we must remember that 'God is not mocked' (Gal. 6. 7), and that our human remedies are then exhausted. On he other hand, to close the gate of repentance against any contrite sinner is to contradict all the Gospels and all the Epistles alike, as well as the Law and the Prophets"—C. B.

7. For the earth—"rather, 'for the land which has drunk in.' Land which not only receives, but also drinks in abundance of rain (Deut. 11. 11), in such a climate as is here thought of, must either 'bring forth herbage' or be condemned as irretrievably barren. By whom it is dressed—rather, 'for whom it is also tilled.' This clause is added to show that nothing is wanting on the part of the owner or of the tillers of the land. Receiveth blessing from God—receives as a reward a share in the blessing which God pronounces on the fruitful earth, resulting in increased fertility. (Gen. 27. 27; 49. 25; Deut. 33. 13.) In the application of the parable, God is the owner of the land, men the tillers; men also are 'God's field' (1 Cor. 3. 9), who bring forth fruit unto God"—MOULTON.

8. That which beareth thorns and briars—"only or chiefly—is rejected—no more labour is bestowed upon it—whose end is to be burned—as Jerusalem was shortly after"—WESLEY.

But that which beareth—"rather, 'but if it bear thorns and briars it is rejected.' We are told that the presence of briars (i.e. caltrops) is a sure evidence of a poor soil, on which labour will be wasted. The words are partially a quotation from Gen. 3. 18. The change of translation here is important; if that very land which has drunk in the abundant rain, and has received careful culture, still prove unfruitful, it is rejected. Men can do no more; and the curse of God is near; its end is for burning. The explanation of the last words is probably found in Deut. 29. 23, which speaks of the land of Sodom which God overthrew, which 'is brimstone, and salt, and burning.' The connection between these two verses and the preceding passages is obvious. In the case of the apostates there described, man is helpless; God's curse is near. But, as S. Chrysostom says, in this very word there is mercy; 'the end' is not yet come"—MOULTON.

9. But, beloved. "In this one place he calls them so. He never uses this appellation but in exhorting. We are persuaded of you things that accompany salvation—we are persuaded you are now saved from your sins; and that ye have that faith, love, and holiness, which lead to final salvation. Though we thus speak—to warn you, lest you should fall from your present steadfastness"—WESLEY.

The writer now turns to the other side of the subject, to the comforting hope that, in the case of his readers, it has not yet come to a falling away. "If we thus speak to you (in this style of earnest warning) we are yet persuaded of better things concerning you, of things that pertain to salvation." The change here from severity to gentleness reminds us of the Pauline passages, Gal. 4. 12, 19; 2 Cor. 10. 11.

10. For—"ye give plain proof of your faith and love, which the righteous God will surely reward"—WESLEY.

Because the readers have already evinced, and still evince, the visible fruits of faith in works of love and service, the author cherishes the persuasion that God will not let them fall, will not withdraw His Spirit and the help of His grace from them.

11. But we desire you may show the same diligence unto the end—"and therefore we thus speak. To the full assurance of hope—which you cannot expect, if you abate your diligence. The full assurance of faith relates to present pardon; the full assurance of hope, to future glory. The former is the highest degree of Divine evidence that God is reconciled to me in the Son of His love; the latter is the same degree of Divine evidence (wrought in the soul by the same immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost) of persevering grace, and of eternal glory. So much, and no more, as faith every moment 'beholds with open face,' so much does hope see to all eternity. But this assurance of faith and hope is not an opinion, not a bare construction of Scripture, but is given immediately by the power of the Holy Ghost; and what none can have for another, but for himself only"—WESLEY.

"We desire . . . same diligence, etc. Fully acknowledging what was praiseworthy in them, the author desires that every one of them (ch. 3. 13; 4. 1; 12. 15, 16) would show the same diligence in regard to his own Christian hope as they had shown, and were showing, in regard to sympathy and love to their brethren. Their public life and public spirit were exemplary, if the same steadiness and resolution only marked their inner life! Here wavering or even unconcern seemed to have begun to threaten them. To the full assurance . . . end; or, 'in respect of the fulness of hope . . . end.' The word is again used of faith (ch. 10. 22). Fulness or full assurance of faith and hope is not anything distinct from faith and hope, lying outside of them, and to which they may lead; it is a condition of faith and hope themselves, the perfect condition. The author desires that they should give diligence to have their hope full, and to sustain it in this fulness unto the end"—DAVIDSON. "Full assurance—rather, 'fulness' (full productiveness) 'of hope' (ch. 10. 22). His desire is that the zeal which they have manifested in works of love may be directed toward the attainment of the full harvest of Christian hope—may be shown unto the very end (ch. 3. 6, 14)"—MOULTON.

12. Inherited the promises—"the promised rest; paradise"—WESLEY.

That ye be not slothful—"rather, 'that ye become not sluggish.' The same word is used as in ch. 5. 11, there applied to apprehension of truth, here to the Christian hope and life; if the truth be not welcomed, there will be no vigour in the life. Followers—better, 'imitators.' (Comp. ch. 13. 7; 1 Cor. 11. 1.) They are not the first to whom 'hope' has been given, and who have needed zeal that they might not fail of their hope"—MOULTON.

13. For—"ye have abundant encouragement, seeing no stronger promise could be made than that great promise which God made to Abraham, and in him to us"—WESLEY.

For when God. "The 'for' implies 'and you may feel absolute confidence about the promises; for,' etc. Made promise to Abraham. Abraham is here only selected as 'the father of the faithful' (Rom. 4. 13); and not as the sole example of persevering constancy, but as an example specially illustrious (Calvin). Because He could swear by no greater. In the Jewish treatise Berachoth Moses is introduced as saying to God, 'Hadst Thou sworn by heaven and earth, I should have said, they will perish, and therefore so may Thy oath; but as Thou hast sworn by Thy great name, that oath shall endure for ever'"—C. B. God when He made promise sware. This fulfilment received by Abraham does not consist in this, that as a just man he is now made perfect (ch. 12. 23), but in this, that the words "multiplying I will multiply thee" (ver. 14), were through his patient waiting realised, as we see (ch. 11. 12), and as he lived to see in some measure (Gen. 25. 7, etc.). It seems fairest to limit the promise to Abraham, which he obtained by patient waiting, to these words of ver. 14), and to take the words in their simple sense according to ch. 11. 12, without importing any deeper messianic meaning into them. The promises, of course, all belong to the same class, and they have the same characteristics.

15. After he had waited—"thirty years. He obtained the promise—Isaac, the pledge of all the promises"—WESLEY.

"Better, And thus (thus being in possession of the promise and the oath of God), having patiently waited (ver. 12), he obtained the promise—the promised gift. Though some portions of the promise received a partial accomplishment during Abraham's life, it is not this that the writer has in view. (See ver. 12, and ch. 11. 13.)"—MOULTON.

16. Men generally swear by Him who is infinitely greater than themselves, and an oath for confirmation, to confirm what is promised or asserted, usually puts an end to all contradiction. This shows that an oath taken in a religious manner is lawful even under the gospel; otherwise the apostle would never have mentioned it with so much honour, as a proper means to confirm the truth"—WESLEY.

Men verily swear by the greater. "(Gen. 21. 23; 24. 3; 26. 30, 31.) The passage is important as showing the lawfulness of Christian oaths. Strife—rather, 'for to them an oath is the end of all gainsaying' (or 'controversy' as to facts 'with a view to confirmation.' It is meant that when men swear in confirmation of a disputed point their word is believed"—C. B.

17. God interposed by an oath—"amazing condescension! He who is greatest of all, acts as if He were a middle person; as if, while He swears, He were less than Himself, by whom He swears! Thou that hearest the promise, dost thou not yet believe?"—WESLEY.

"Wherein—rather, 'on which principle,' 'in accordance with this human custom.' Willing—rather, 'wishing' More abundantly—i.e. than if He had not sworn. Unto the heirs of promise—rather 'of the promise.' The heirs of the promise were primarily Abraham and his seed, and then all Christians. (Gal. 3. 29.) The immutability of His counsel. 'I am the Lord, I change not' (Mal. 3. 6). (See too Isa. 46. 10, 11; Ps. 33. 11; Jas. 1. 17.) His changeless 'decree' was that in Abraham's seed all the nations of the world should be blessed. On the other hand the Mosaic Law was mutable (ch. 7. 12; 12. 27). Confirmed it by an oath—rather, 'intervened with an oath,' i.e. made His oath intermediate between Himself and Abraham"—C. B. When men appeal to God, the greater One, they bring Him in as Surety between themselves and those to whom they make promise or affirmation. In condescension to their practice, and in order to show the immutability of His purpose contained in His promise, God took this way; but being unable to appeal to a greater than Himself, He brought in Himself as Surety, He mediated or came in between men and Himself, through the oath by Himself.

18. That by two unchangeable things—"His promise and His oath, in either, much more in both of which, it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation—swallowing up all doubt and fear. Who have fled—after having been tossed by many storms—to lay hold on the hope set before us—on Christ, the object of our hope, and the glory we hope for through Him"—WESLEY.

Two immutable things—"the promise and the oath. Consolation—rather, 'encouragement.' For us, rather than for Abraham alone, was the encouragement designed; for us, who (as men in danger of their lives flee to the sanctuary) fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us in the promise. Up to this point we read of what God has done; here of what must be done by man. The 'laying hold' expresses the 'faith' and implies the 'patient waiting' (ver. 12); by it we become true 'heirs of the promise' (ver. 17)"—MOULTON.

19. "Which hope in Christ we have as an anchor of the soul—entering into heaven itself, and fixed there—within the veil. Thus he slides back to the priesthood of Christ"—WESLEY.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul. "A beautiful image, introduced for a moment only to set forth the security of the soul, though tossed by the waves of trouble. This symbol of hope, so familiar to us in Christian art, is not mentioned in the Old Testament, but is found in Greek proverbial sayings, and (it is said) appears on ancient coins. Both sure and steadfast. These words and the following may, indeed, form part of the figure; but more probably relate to the hope itself—a hope unfailing, firm, which entereth where no human sight can follow, even into the Most Holy Place, into heaven itself. The hope becomes personified, that the reader's thought may be led to Him who is Himself our hope"—MOULTON. "We have here a description of the absolute certainty of this Christian hope, and also a designation of the Most Holy Place. (Comp. Ex. 26. 33; Lev. 16. 2, 12, 15.) The Most Holy Place is spoken of as a symbol of heaven, where God is enthroned in His glory, and at His right hand is enthroned the exalted Christ"—LUNEMANN.

20. "A forerunner uses to be less in dignity than those that are to follow him. But it is not so here; for Christ who is gone before us is infinitely superior to us. What an honour is it to believers, to have so glorious a Forerunner, now appearing in the presence of God for them!"—WESLEY.

"Whither the Forerunner—made an High Priest; or, 'a Forerunner'—'having become an High Priest' (i.e. on entering); or in a slightly different way, 'whither as Forerunner for us Jesus entered, becoming an High Priest' (i.e. when He entered). Our hope is sure and steadfast, because it enters within the veil, and it enters within the veil because it rests on the Melchisedec priesthood of Jesus, who exercises His priesthood there. This is true whether the hope be internal or external. The object of hope is the inheritance set forth in the promises. The Christian hope fastens on this. Either hope rests on the promise guaranteed by the oath. But hope rests also on the fact which is the means to the fulfilment of the promise, the Melchisedec ministry of the Son. Jesus is entered into that which is within the veil, 'having obtained eternal redemption' (ch. 9. 12), and for this cause He is the Mediator of a new covenant, that they which have been called may receive the 'promise of eternal inheritance' (ch. 9. 15). Our hope enters there with Him, and holds us secure; He is Forerunner whom we shall follow where the inheritance lies"—DAVIDSON. "There can be no Forerunner except where there is a company to follow Him, for whom He goes forward to prepare. Now Christ is the Forerunner, and the race is following after Him"—BEECHER.

CHAPTER VII.

1. "The sum of this chapter is Christ, as appears from His type, Melchisedec, who was greater than Abraham himself, from whom Levi descended, has a priesthood altogether excellent, new, firm, perpetual"—WESLEY.

For this Melchisedec. "All that is historically known of Melchisedec is found in three verses of the Book of Genesis (ch. 14. 18, 19, 20). In all the twenty centuries of sacred history he is only mentioned once, in Ps. 110. 4. This chapter is a mystical explanation of the significance of these two brief allusions. It was not wholly new, since the Jews attached high honour to the name of Melchisedec, whom they identified with Shem"—C. B.

2. Being first—"according to the meaning of his own name—King of righteousness, then—according to the name of his city—King of peace—so in him, as in Christ, righteousness and peace were joined. And so they are in all that believe in Him"—WESLEY.

"Gave a tenth part—lit. 'divided a tenth.' This point is fully treated of in vers. 4–9. King of righteousness—Josephus notes the significance of this name. 'The first founder of Jerusalem was a chief of the Canaanites, who in our tongue is called Righteous King; for indeed such he was.' The special interest of these titles for the writer lies in the application to Jesus the Messiah. (See ch. 1. 8, 9; Isa. 9. 6, 7; 32. 1; Jer. 23. 5, 6; Zech. 9. 9; Eph. 2. 14.) On this, as obvious to every Christian reader, he does not further dwell"—MOULTON.

3. Without father, without mother, without pedigree—"recorded without any account of his descent from any ancestors of the priestly order. Having neither beginning of days, nor end of life—mentioned by Moses. But being—in all these respects—made like the Son of God—who is really 'without father,' as to His human nature; 'without mother,' as to His Divine; and in this also, 'without pedigree.' Neither descended from any ancestors of the priestly order. Remaineth a priest continually—nothing is recorded of the death or successor of Melchisedec. But Christ alone does really remain without death, and without successor"—WESLEY.

"Without father . . . without descent—rather, 'without genealogy,' or register of descent. The two preceding characteristics indicate that Melchisedec was king as well as priest, and that he and his kingdom were righteous and peaceful. These characteristics now introduced refer to the person of the priest. His priesthood is independent of father or mother or genealogical register, The words do not mean that Melchisedec came into existence having no father and no mother, but that in the picture presented of him in Scripture, he stands unconnected with any family, and yet a priest. Beginning of days or end of life. These words also refer to the picture in Gen. 14. No history of his birth is given, nor any of his death, as is usual in Scripture, and the omission is significant. In regard to the words 'without father,' etc., it might be true, in fact, that as a priest Melchisedec had no progenitor; his priesthood might belong to himself, being exercised in virtue of his high place among his people. If he followed another who was priest, his priesthood would not be the same, but one belonging to himself. The question of what the facts were ought not here to be raised. Without beginning of days, etc., show these words must mean, of whom no beginning of days is recorded. Otherwise Melchisedec becomes magnified into a supernatural being, contrary to the plain scope of Gen. 14. But made like unto the Son of God, i.e. in this particular, that he had neither beginning of days nor end of life. The clause is connected only with the preceding, not with the words 'without father,' etc. The Son of God is spoken of here as the Epistle represents Him, existing from eternity (ch. 9. 14; 1. 2), and living for ever (ch. 1. 10–12). Such a comparison is decisive against attributing these characteristics to Melchisedec in a real sense. They belong to the portrait of him, which was so drawn that he was 'made like' the Son of God. As we see Melchisedec in that picture of him, which is a prophetic copy of another, he is a priest continually. Like a portrait, he is always the same; he follows us about with his eyes, a king and a priest, always alone, with no ancestry of priesthood before him, and none succeeding to his priesthood after him, always living—so Scripture shows him, and so continually in its pages we behold him"—DAVIDSON.

4. "The greatness of Melchisedec is described in all the preceding and following particulars. But the most manifest proof of it was, that Abraham gave him tithes as to a priest of God and a superior; though he was himself a patriarch, greater than a king, and a progenitor of many kings"—WESLEY.

How great this man was—"better 'is'; the greatness abides, set forth in the words of Scripture. In the rest of the verse (where the best MSS. omit the word 'even') it is well to follow the literal rendering, under whom Abraham gave a tenth out of the chief spoils—(Abraham) the patriarch. 'He gave him tithes of all' (Gen. 14. 20), but the tenth was selected from the choicest part of the spoils. 'Patriarch' is a word used in the LXX. (in Chronicles only) for the head of a family or chief of a clan. In the New Testament it is used of David in Acts 2. 29, and twice in Acts 7. of Jacob's sons. The next verse deals with the same subject, but under a new aspect. Here the thought is, Melchisedec received tithes even from Abraham the patriarch; there, he has been thus honoured, though no enactment of law invested him with superior rights"—MOULTON.

5. The sons of Levi take tithes of their brethren—"sprung from Abraham as well as themselves. The Levites, therefore, are greater than they; but the priests are greater than the Levites, the patriarch Abraham than the priests, and Melchisedec than him"—WESLEY.

To take tithes, etc.—"indirectly, through the agency of the Levites. Delitzsch argues that after the Exile the priests collected the tithes themselves. It cannot, however, be proved that the priests themselves tithed the people. This was done by the Levites, who gave the tithe of their tithes to the priests. (Num. 18. 22–26; Neh. 10. 38.) There is, however, no real difficulty about the expression, for the priests might tithe the people, as Jewish tradition says that they did in the days of Ezra. There is, therefore, no need to alter 'the people' into Levi. The priests stood alone in receiving tithes and giving none"—C. B.

6. He who is not from them—"the Levites—blessed—another proof of his superiority. Even him that had the promises—that was so highly favoured of God. When S. Paul speaks of Christ, he says, 'the promise'; 'promises' refer to other blessings also"—WESLEY.

"And blessed—lit. 'and hath blessed.' Second point of superiority. The act is regarded as permanent, and still continuous in its effects, in accordance with the writer's manner of regarding Scripture as a living and present entity. Notwithstanding the privileged position of the Levitical priests (ver. 5), Melchisedec yet occupies a far higher position. The clause and blessed him who had the promises serves yet further to make manifest the dignity and exaltedness of Melchisedec. For, by the fact that Abraham had received the Divine promises, that his seed should be multiplied, and in him all nations of the earth should be blessed (Gen. 12. 2 f.; 13. 14 f.), he had been already most highly favoured of God. How high thus must that man stand who imparts his blessing to one already so highly favoured, since truly—as is immediately expressly added, ver. 7—the dispenser of the blessing is ever more exalted than the recipient of the blessing"—LUNEMANN.

7. The less is blessed—"authoritatively, of the greater"—WESLEY.

Blessing was one of the recognised priestly functions. (Num. 6. 23–26.)

8. And here—"in the Levitical priesthood. But there—in the case of Melchisedec. He of whom it is testified that he liveth—who is not spoken of as one that died for another to succeed him, but is represented only as living, no mention being made either of his birth or death"—WESLEY.

Another aspect of the superiority of Melchisedec.—Here men that die . . . liveth. The Levitical priests are mortal men. Melchisedec is borne witness to that he liveth. No express testimony of this kind is found, but it is virtually contained in the silence of Scripture regarding his death, and in the picture of him as living, which the Author interprets to mean that he had "neither beginning of days, nor end of life" (ver. 3). Here all that the author has in view is the point of superiority; Melchisedec liveth, the Levitical priests are mortal men. The consequences of this superiority are alluded to later (ver. 25). Their priesthood belongs to them as a body, and they retain it for a time. His is wholly his own, and he retains it always.

9. And even Levi, who received tithes—"not in person, but in his successors, as it were, paid tithes—in the person of Abraham"—WESLEY.

"Levi may be said to have directly acknowledged the superiority of Melchisedec, for being in the loins of Abraham he, so to speak, paid tithes to him. In these verses (4-10) the apostle gives a summary of the points in his view significant in the Melchisedec priesthood, giving it superiority to the Aaronic or Levitical. He lays hold of two points: that Melchisedec exercised his priestly functions of tithing and blessing, not in virtue of belonging to a priestly family empowered by law to exercise the priesthood, but in virtue of what he was in himself as a person; and that he liveth. The Levitical priests are so in virtue of a mere law, not from any personal superiority to their brethren; and they are men that die. These points both touch the person of the priest, and have no reference to ministry in itself, and this shows what the Epistle means by 'order' of priesthood. Further, the royalty of the priest is not alluded to in this summary"—DAVIDSON.

11. "The apostle now demonstrates that the Levitical priesthood must yield to the priesthood of Christ, because Melchisedec, after whose order He is a priest—(1) Is opposed to Aaron (vers. 11-14); (2) Hath no end of life (vers. 15-19), but 'remaineth a priest continually.' If now perfection were by the Levitical priesthood—if this perfectly answered all God's designs and man's wants. For under it the people received the Law—whence some might infer, that perfection was by that priesthood. What further need was there, that another priest—of a new order, should be set up? From this single consideration it is plain that both the priesthood and the Law, which were inseparably connected, were now to give way to a better priesthood and more excellent dispensation"—WESLEY.

If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood. "At this point begins the argument which occupies the next nine verses. 'Perfection' (comp. the verb in ch. 9. 9; 10. 1, 14; 11. 40) means power of perfectionment, capacity to achieve the end in view; but this was not to be attained through the Levitic priesthood. The fifth point of superiority is that the Melchisedec priesthood implies the abrogation of the Levitic, and of the whole Law which was based upon it. For under it—rather, 'for on the basis of it.' The writer regards the priesthood rather than the Law as constituting the basis of the whole Mosaic system; so that into this slight parenthesis he really infuses the essence of his argument. The priesthood is obviously changed. For otherwise the theocratic King of Ps. 110 would not have been called 'a Priest after the order of Melchisedec' but 'after the order of Aaron. Clearly then 'the order of Aaron' admitted of no attainment of perfection through its means. But if the priesthood was thus condemned as imperfect and inefficient, the Law was equally disparaged as a transitory institution. Righteousness did not 'come by the Law'; if it could so have come Christ would have died in vain (Gal. 2. 21; comp. Heb. 10. 1-14)"—C. B.

12. For—"one of these cannot be changed without the other"—WESLEY.

"This verse connects itself with the parenthesis in ver. 11. For if the priesthood is changed there takes place also of necessity a change of law. It is no light matter to speak of the order of Aaron as set aside: this carries with it a change of law"—MOULTON.

13. "But the priesthood is manifestly changed from one order to another, and from one tribe to another. For He of whom these things are spoken—namely, Jesus—pertaineth to another tribe—that of Judah—of which no man was suffered by the Law to attend on, or minister at, the altar"—WESLEY.

That Jesus is He of whom these things are spoken, the author does not prove, and needs not to prove. His readers did not doubt that Jesus was the Messiah; the question only was, whether by this Messiah the Old Testament cultus was abolished, or whether it still continues.

14. For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah—"whatever difficulties have arisen since, during so long a tract of time, it was then clear beyond dispute"—WESLEY.

Confirming what is said in ver. 13, the author appeals to the manifest historical fact that our Lord sprang from the tribe of Judah. We have, here, therefore, rather a most significant proof, that the descent of Jesus from the tribe of Judah was a well and universally known fact before the destruction of Jerusalem. In the same years in which the Gospels of Mark and Luke were written, the descent of Jesus from David was already universally known.

15. And it is still far more evident that —"both the priesthood and the Law are changed, because the priest now raised up is not only of another tribe, but of a quite different order"—WESLEY.

And it is—"that which is yet far more evident is the proposition of the preceding verses, viz. the failure of the Levitical priesthood to bring 'perfection' (ver. 11), a failure placed beyond doubt by the change of priesthood (vers. 13, 14). 'And what we are speaking of is yet more abundantly evident, if after the likeness of Melchisedec there ariseth a different priest, who hath been made (priest) not according to a law of a carnal commandment, but according to power of indissoluble life.' Hitherto, in vers. 12-14, the thought has rested on what is given up, viz. the priesthood of Aaron, set aside by the words of prophecy (Ps. 110. 4); and so far as these three verses are concerned, nothing more might be intended than the transference of the priesthood to another line of men. Far more striking will the proof appear, when we look upon the other side, and observe what is brought in—a priesthood like Melchisedec's, resting not on mere positive enactment, but assumed by inherent power, by right of 'life' (ver. 8)"—MOULTON.

16. Who is made—"a Priest—not after the law of a carnal commandment—not according to the Mosaic Law, which consisted chiefly of 'commandments' that were 'carnal,' compared to the spirituality of the gospel. But after the power of an endless life—which He has in Himself, as the Eternal Son of God"—WESLEY.

After the law of a carnal commandment—"rather, 'in accordance with the law of a fleshen (i.e. earthly commandment).' Neither this writer, nor even S. Paul, ever called or would have called the Law 'carnal,' a term which S. Paul implicitly disclaims when he says that the Law is 'spiritual' (Rom. 7. 14); but to call it 'fleshen' is merely to say that it is hedged about with earthly limitations and relationships, and therefore unfit to be adapted to eternal conditions. Its ordinances indeed might be called ordinances of the flesh (ch. 9. 10), because they had to do, almost exclusively, with externals. An attentive reader will see that even in the closest apparent resemblances to the language of S. Paul there are differences in this Epistle. For instance, his relative disparagement of the Law turns almost exclusively on the conditions of its hierarchy; and his use of the word 'flesh' and 'fleshen' refers not to the sensual passions but to mortality and transience. Of an endless life—lit. 'of an indissoluble life,' the life of a tabernacle which 'could not be dissolved.' The priest of this new law and priesthood is 'the Prince of Life' (Acts 3. 15)"—C. B.

18. "For there is implied in this new and everlasting priesthood, and in the new dispensation connected therewith, a disannulling of the preceding commandment—an abrogation of the Mosaic Law. For the weakness and unprofitableness thereof—for its insufficiency either to justify or sanctify"—WESLEY.

For the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. "The writer here shows how completely he is of the school of S. Paul, notwithstanding the strength of his Judaic sympathies. For S. Paul was the first who clearly demonstrated that Christianity involved the abrogation of the Law, and thereby proved its partial, transitory, and inefficacious character as intended only to be a preparation for the gospel. (Rom. 8. 3.) The Law was only the 'tutor' or attendant-slave to lead men to Christ, or train their boyhood till it could attain to full Christian manhood. (Gal. 2. 23, 24.) It was only after the consummation of the gospel that its disciplinary institutions became reduced to 'weak and beggarly rudiments' (Gal. 4. 9)"—C. B.

19. For the Law—"taken by itself, separate from the gospel—made nothing perfect—could not perfect its votaries, either in faith or love, in happiness or holiness. But the bringing in of a better hope—of the gospel dispensation, which gives us a better ground of confidence, does. By which we draw nigh to God—yea, so nigh as to be one spirit with Him. And this is true perfection"—WESLEY.

"In this Epistle the Law is the commandment of the priesthood, and the flesh is the physical descent, bodily conditions, and mortal lives, to which it has reference; and the weakness of the Law is inherent in itself, because it has reference to such things. In S. Paul the Law which is holy and good in itself is something to be obeyed, and it is without power to produce righteousness, because the carnal mind cannot be subject to it. In this Epistle the Law is not a commandment to be obeyed by man, obedience to which is righteousness, but an institution designed to effect atonement for men's sins; and it is unable to accomplish this from its own inherent weakness, because it has reference only to the flesh, and does not apply to the conscience ch. 9. 9, 10, 13, 14; 10. 2)"—DAVIDSON.

20. And—"the greater solemnity wherewith He was made Priest, further proves the superior excellency of His priesthood"—WESLEY.

From the terms of the prophecy, now fulfilled, the author passes to the circumstances accompanying the giving of it. These also are full of meaning. The oath that accompanies it reveals its eternal nature, and the change by it from the temporary to the eternal covenant (ch. 13. 20).

21. The Lord sware and will not repent—"Hence also it appears, that His is an unchangeable priesthood"—WESLEY.

"What was typical in Melchisedec is real in our Lord. He is made a priest, 'not according to a law of fleshly,' frail, and perishable, 'ordinances,' 'but with reference to' that 'power' which belonged to His Divine nature and endless Being. Hence the perpetuity of His priesthood is secured by an oath"—TREFFRY.

22. Of so much better a covenant—"unchangeable, eternal—was Jesus made a Surety—or Mediator. The word 'covenant' frequently occurs in the remaining part of this Epistle. The original word means either a covenant or a last will and testament. S. Paul takes it sometimes in the former, sometimes in the latter, sense; sometimes he includes both"—WESLEY.

Of a better testament. "A clearer rendering would be 'by so much better was the covenant of which Jesus has been made surety.' The words—which might be taken as the keynote of the whole Epistle—should undoubtedly be rendered 'of a better covenant.' The Greek word diathēkē is the rendering of the Hebrew Berith, which means a covenant. Of 'testaments' the Hebrews knew nothing until they learnt the custom of 'making a will' from the Romans. So completely was this the case that there is no word in Hebrew which means 'a will'"—C. B. By so much was Jesus made—"better, 'by so much also hath Jesus become surety of a better covenant.' The form of the sentence recalls ch. 1. 4. As the priest whose appointment is confirmed by the oath of God is raised above all former priests, in the same proportion is the covenant of which Jesus is surety higher, better, than the former covenant. For the 'better hope' of ver. 19 we now read 'better covenant'; the new idea is not different in substance, but is more definite and clear. The very promise of the 'other priest' brought with it a 'better hope'; the recollection of the Divine oath is fitly succeeded by the mention of a 'covenant'"—MOULTON.

23. They were many priests—"one after another"—WESLEY.

"Rather, have been made priests many (i.e. 'in large numbers'), because by death they were prevented from continuing. (Comp. ver. 8, where the thought is somewhat similar")—MOULTON.

24. He continueth for ever—"in life and in His priesthood—that passeth not away—to any successor"—WESLEY.

But this man—"better, 'but He, because He remaineth for ever, hath His priesthood inviolable (or unchangeable'). The former ordinance related to a race, and the individuals were ever passing away; since His life is 'indissoluble' (ver. 16), none can trespass on His right and invade His priesthood. The rendering of the margin, 'that passeth not from one to another,' expresses nearly the same thought; but it is very doubtful whether the Greek will bear this meaning"—MOULTON. The Old Testament priest being mortal, was not suffered to remain, and his priesthood passed to another, or was entered upon by another: He, "because He abideth in life for ever, has His priesthood of such a kind that He cannot overstep it, or of such a kind that another cannot step into it."

25. Wherefore He is able to save to the uttermost—"from all the guilt, power, root, and consequence of sin—them who come—by faith—to God through Him—as their Priest. Seeing He ever liveth to make intercession—that is He ever lives and intercedes. He died once; He intercedes perpetually"—WESLEY.

To save to the uttermost them that draw near. "The word 'uttermost' does not refer to time, to generation after generation,—such an idea, though true in itself, could not occur here,—but to degree or perfection of salvation. The offering of Christ enables men to draw near unto God; those that thus draw near He is able to save completely, to bring them through all hindrances to that honour and glory designed for them (ch. 2. 7, 10), which He Himself has reached as the Captain of their salvation (ch. 2. 9, 10; 5. 7–9). Seeing . . to make intercession—through His intercession they receive help in their temptations (ch. 2. 18; 4. 16), and are enabled to hold fast their faith unto the end (ch. 3. 6; 10. 23); and thus through all vicissitudes, by patient endurance, they are saved to the uttermost, and inherit the promises. With regard to this intercession of the Son it may be said, that of course it is not to be understood as made through words. Again, it is not to be confounded with His offering of Himself in the heavenly sanctuary. This He did once for all and without repetition (ch. 9. 26–28; 20. 18); His intercession is continued. Neither is His intercession merely His appearance and constant presence before the face of God for us (ch. 9. 24), as if God, having Him ever in His sight, were held in unbroken remembrance of His work for men, and had in Him, who was tempted in all points like as we are, continually before His eyes a type and representative of His people upon the earth, and was thus for ever appealed to in a double way. The intercession is regarded rather as a direct representation to God on the part of the Son. Immediately connected with it seems to be that we draw near unto God through Him (comp. chaps. 7. 25 with 10. 19 and 21), and that through Him we 'offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually' (ch. 13. 15). That which will enable Him to make it pointed on our behalf is His fellow-feeling with us (ch. 4. 14–5. 10); that which will give it power with God may be His having offered Himself, and that He is the Son of God; and that which is the effect of it, is grace to help in time of need (ch. 4. 16). To define it in itself may be impossible. He has left us an example (John 17.) how He interceded in human speech to God in the days of His flesh, and translating this into the modes of heavenly communion, so far as we can imagine them, we may form some conception of it"—DAVIDSON. Wherefore—since His priesthood is inviolable, His power of saving is complete—MOULTON.

26. For such an High Priest suited us—"unholy, mischievous, defiled sinners: a blessed paradox! Holy—with respect to God. Harmless—with respect to men. Undefiled—with any sin in Himself. Separated from sinners—as well as free from sin. And so He was when He left the world. And made—even in His human nature — higher than the heavens—and all their inhabitants"—WESLEY.

"For such a High Priest became us. The 'for' clinches the whole argument with a moral consideration. There was a spiritual fitness in this annulment of the imperfect Law and priesthood, and the introduction of a better hope and covenant. So great and so sympathetic and so innocent an High Priest was suited to our necessities. There is much rhetorical beauty in the order of the Greek. He might have written it in the order of the English, but he keeps the word 'priest' by way of emphasis as the last word of the clause, and then substitutes High Priest for it. Holy towards God (Lev. 20. 26; Ps. 16. 10; Acts 2. 27). He bore 'holiness to the Lord' not on a golden mitre-plate, but as the inscription of all His life as 'the Holy One of God' (Mark 1. 24). Harmless—as regards men. Undefiled—not stained (Isa. 53. 9), and as the word implies unstainable — with any of the defilements which belonged to the Levitic priests from their confessed sinfulness. Christ was 'without sin' (ch. 4. 15); 'without spot' (ch. 9. 14; 1 Pet. 1. 19). He 'knew no sin' (2 Cor. 5. 21). Separate from sinners—lit. 'Having been separated from sinners.' The writer is already beginning to introduce the subject of the day of atonement, on which he proceeds to speak. To enable the high priest to perform the functions of that day aright the most scrupulous precautions were taken to obviate the smallest chance of ceremonial pollution (Lev. 21. 10-15); yet even these rigid precautions had at least once in living memory been frustrated—when the high priest Ishmael ben Phabi had been incapacitated from his duties, because in conversing with Hareth (Aretas) Emir of Arabia, a speck of the Emir's saliva had fallen upon the high priest's beard. But Christ was free not only from ceremonial pollution, but from that far graver moral stain of which the ceremonial was a mere external figure; and had now been exalted above all contact with sin in the Heaven of Heavens (ch. 4. 14)"—C. B.

27. Who needed not to offer up sacrifices daily—"that is, on every yearly day of expiation; for He offered once for all: not for His own sins, for He then offered up Himself 'without spot to God'"—WESLEY.

"This verse carries on the description, presenting what follows from this purity and sinlessness. For this He did once — rather, 'once for all.' These words and those that follow, 'when He offered up Himself,' are best understood as a parenthesis. The truth stated in the former part of the verse, that Jesus needeth not, like the high priests, to offer up sacrifices, first for His own sins and then 'for those of the people,' finds its explanation in ver. 28, 'For the Law,' etc. But, having introduced the thought of a sacrifice for the sins of the people—a thought not yet expressly mentioned in any part of the Epistle in connection with Jesus, though virtually presented, as we have seen, in many earlier words—the writer will not pass on without the most emphatic statement that such a sacrifice was offered once for all, in the sacrifice of Himself"—MOULTON. Offered Himself. Christ is thus not only the High Priest of the new covenant, but also the victim offered. (Comp. 8. 3; 9. 1, 2, 14, 25 f.; 10. 10, 12, 14; Eph. 5. 2)"—LUNEMANN.

28. The Law maketh men high priests that have infirmity—"that are both weak, mortal, and sinful. But the oath which was since the Law—namely in the time of David —maketh the Son, who is consecrated for ever—who, being now free, both from sin and death, from natural and moral infirmity, remaineth a priest for ever"—WESLEY.

"The Son was appointed Priest, having been made perfect. The term made perfect is a single word that embraces it in all the different points enumerated in ver. 26, relating both to the moral being and present sphere of existence of the Son. It is the high priest's infirmity that makes his offering for himself necessary. This infirmity is described as his own sins. It is implied in the Son's perfection that He has no infirmity, but it is to press the expression 'made perfect' unduly to infer from it that before His perfection the Son had infirmity—taking that infirmity even in the sense of innocent human weakness, or a moral condition still under probation. The idea of a moral probation of the Son seems foreign to the Epistle; and there seems no reference even to human weaknesses here. There is strictly no contrast between the state of the Son before perfection and when perfected. The contrast is between a Son made perfect and the human high priest who has infirmity. The Son's being made perfect excludes the idea of infirmity, and therefore the necessity of offering for Himself; but the author's language does not suggest any contrast between the Son's state of perfection and His condition in the flesh, beyond this, that He is 'separated from sinners' and become higher than the heavens,' words referring to His surroundings, not to His own moral condition"—DAVIDSON.

CHAPTER VIII.

"THE mode in which this chapter is introduced shows that, in the writer's own arrangement, a new division of the argument begins here. On examination we shall find that there is a clear difference between the topics discussed before and after this point; though it was hardly possible, and certainly was not the intention of the writer, strictly to maintain this distinction in every particular"—MOULTON.

1. We have such an High Priest. "Having finished his description of the type in Melchisedec, the apostle begins to treat directly of the excellency of Christ's priesthood beyond the Levitical. Who is set down—having finished His oblation—at the right hand of the Majesty — of God"—WESLEY.

"The chief point is as follows:—We have a High Priest who sat down . . . a minister, etc. Such an High Priest . . . set; or, 'who sat down.' 'Such is explained by the words 'who sat down,' etc. This is a trait in the history of this High Priest, and indicates both His greatness and the sphere where He is. He sat down, and He is a minister of the true tabernacle. Of course His sitting down did not precede but followed His ministry there. His sitting down and His being a minister in the true sanctuary have the same meaning, and imply the finality of His offering. All that may be said of the High Priest and His ministry is grouped together so as to be taken in at one glance, and His sitting down at the right hand of God is a token both of His greatness and of the finality of the offering which He made as a minister in the true tabernacle (ch. 10. 11, 12). The apostle combines the two prophetical passages, 'Sit Thou at My right hand' (Ps. 110. 1), and 'Thou art a Priest' (Ps. 110. 4); the first is the basis of ver. 1 and the second of ver. 2; and the two verses imply that our High Priest is in the heavens and has His high-priestly ministry there, and suggest the finality of His offering there"—DAVIDSON.

2. A minister—"who represents his own sacrifice, as the high priest did the blood of those sacrifices once a year—of the sanctuary—heaven, typified by the Holy of Holies. And of the true tabernacle—perhaps His human nature, of which the old tabernacle was a type. Which the Lord hath fixed—for ever. Not man — as Moses fixed the tabernacle"—WESLEY.

Of the sanctuary. "The word here rendered 'minister' (see ch. 1. 7, 14) is very commonly used in the LXX. for the officiating priest. It is difficult, however, to decide on the meaning of the words here joined with it—whether they denote holy things or holy place; if the latter, what is the distinction between this holy place and 'the true tabernacle'? The ordinary usage of the Epistle would suggest 'holy place,' and perhaps the occurrence of both expressions in ch. 9. 11, 12 (where there is no doubt as to the translation) is sufficient to remove any hesitation here. The 'sanctuary,' therefore, will probably be the heavenly counterpart of the Holiest Place; the true (or 'real') tabernacle, the counterpart of the sacred tent of Moses, containing both the holy place and the holiest of all (ch. 9. 2–4)"—MOULTON. "This verse declares the capacity in which Christ has sat down at the right hand of God, as a sacrificing priest of the true sanctuary and tabernacle, which the Lord erected, not a man"—LUNEMANN.

3. Have somewhat also to offer—namely, the blood of His one sacrifice. The point is one of the extremest importance, and though the writer does not pause to explain what was the sacrifice which Christ offered as High Priest, he purposely introduces the subject here to prepare for his subsequent development of it in ch. 9. 12; 10. 5–7, 11, 12. Similarly S. Paul tells us, "Christ hath given Himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour" (Eph. 5. 2).

4. But if He were on earth—"if His priesthood terminated here—He could not be a priest—at all, consistently with the Jewish institutions. There being other priests—to whom alone this office is allotted"—WESLEY.

For if He were—"rather, 'now if He were still on earth.' If He were on earth. His sanctuary must be a heavenly one, for in the earthly one He had no standpoint. He should not be a priest. He would not be so much as a priest at all; still less even a High Priest; for He was of the tribe of Judah (ch. 7. 14), and the Law had distinctly ordained that 'no stranger, which is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense before the Lord' (Num. 16. 40). Seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the Law—rather (omitting 'priests' with the best MSS.), since 'there are (already) those who offer their gifts according to the Law.' The writer could not possibly have used these present tenses if the Epistle had been written after the fall of Jerusalem. Jewish institutions are, indeed, spoken of in the present tense, after the fall of Jerusalem, by Barnabas and Clement of Rome; but they are merely using an every-day figure of speech. In case of the Epistle to the Hebrews the argument would have gained such indefinite force and weight in passages like this by appealing to a fact so startling as the annulment of the Mosaic system by God Himself, working by the unmistakable demonstrations of history, that no writer similarly circumstanced could possibly have passed over such a point in silence"—FARRAR.

5. Who serve—"the Temple, which was not yet destroyed—after the pattern and shadow of heavenly things—of spiritual, evangelical worship, and of everlasting glory. The pattern —somewhat like the strokes pencilled out upon a piece of fine linen, which exhibit the figures of leaves and flowers, but have not yet received their splendid colours and curious shades. And shadow — or shadowy representation, which gives you some dim and imperfect idea of the body, but not the fine features, not the distinguishing air ; none of those living graces which adorn the real person. Yet both the pattern and shadow lead our minds to something nobler than themselves : the 'pattern,' to that holiness and glory which complete it ; the 'shadow,' to that which occasions it"—WESLEY.

The earthly sanctuary and tabernacle, though in some sense a representation of the heavenly things, are an imperfect likeness. In heaven are the true sanctuary and tabernacle. The point which it is desired to make is that the earthly tabernacle, made of what was shown in the Mount, is but a copy ; the true original tabernacle is in heaven. EDWARDS says : "The Jewish priesthood itself teaches the existence of a heavenly sanctuary. All the arrangements of tabernacle and ritual were made after a pattern shown to Moses on Mount Sinai. The priests, in the tabernacle and through their ritual, ministered to the holy place, as the visible image and outline of the real holiest place—that is, heaven—which the Lord pitched, not man. Now Christ's more excellent ministry as High Priest in heaven carries in its bosom all that the apostle contends for, the establishment of a new covenant of the Law. 'He has obtained a ministry the more excellent, by how much He is the Mediator of a better covenant.' These words contain in a nutshell the entire argument, or series of arguments, that extends from this verse to ver. 18 of ch. 10."

6. And now He hath obtained a more excellent ministry—"His priesthood as much excels theirs, as the promises of the gospel (whereof He is a surety) excel those of the Law. These better promises are specified (vers. 10, 11), those in the Law were mostly temporal promises"—WESLEY.

"The great point of contrast here is precisely the same as in the former example ; and the argument upon which the entire discourse depends is that Moses was the servant, and that Christ is 'the Son'"—TREFFRY. "The ministry of the Levitical priests in the Mosaic tabernacle stands related to the ministry of Christ in the 'heavenly things' precisely as the old 'covenant' does to the new. The new covenant is founded on better promises ; for (comp. vers. 9, 10) the old covenant promised salvation and blessing only to him who perfectly fulfilled the Law ; the new covenant, on the other hand, gives first before it asks"—OLSHAUSEN.

7. For if the first had been faultless—"if that dispensation had answered all God's designs and man's wants, if it had not been weak and unprofitable, unable to make anything perfect, no place would have been for a second"—WESLEY.

"This verse serves to obviate an objection that might arise in the minds of the readers at ver. 6. They were wont to consider Moses, and the covenant of God with Moses, as the proper and most sacred kernel of the Israelitish true religion. Had not the Messiah Himself, according to their view, been promised and given precisely to the members of the Mosaic covenant people! Now to say that this covenant of God with Moses was lowered in value by another covenant, must have appeared to them as almost frivolous. Therefore the author explains to them that he is at liberty to depreciate, nay to find fault with, the old covenant, and why he is so. If that first covenant had been faultless, then there had been no room for desiring a second"—EBRARD.

8. "But there is ; for finding fault with them—who were under the old covenant. He saith, I make a new covenant with the house of Israel—with all the Israel of God, in all ages and nations. It is new in many respects, though not as to the substance of it—(1) being ratified by the death of Christ ; (2) freed from those burdensome rites and ceremonies ; (3) containing a more full and clear account of spiritual religion ; (4) attended with larger influences of the Spirit ; (5) extended to all men ; and (6) never to be abolished"—WESLEY.

For finding fault with them. "The 'for' introduces his proof that 'place for a better covenant was being sought for.' The persons blamed are not expressed, for the word 'them' belongs to He says. Perhaps the meaning is 'blaming the first covenant, He says to them' (who were under it). The 'He' is God speaking to the prophet. Behold, the days come. "The quotation is from Jer. 31. 31–34. I will make. The Hebrew word means literally, 'I will cut,' alluding perhaps to the slaying of victims at the inauguration of a covenant. But the LXX. and the writer of the Epistle substitute a less literal word"—C. B.

9. When I took them by the hand—"with the care and tenderness of a parent. And just while this was fresh in their memory, they obeyed ; but presently after they shook off the yoke. They continued not in My covenant, and I regarded them not—so that covenant was soon broken in pieces"—WESLEY.

Because they continued not in My covenant. "The disobedience of the Israelites was a cause for nullifying the covenant which they had transgressed. (Judg. 2. 20, 21 ; 2 Kings 17. 15–18.) (Comp. Hos. 1. 9, 'Ye are not My people, and I will not be your God.') And I regarded them not. These words correspond to the 'though I was a Husband unto them' of the original. The quotation is from the LXX., who perhaps followed a slightly different reading. Rabbi Kimchi holds that the rendering of the LXX. is justifiable even with the present reading"—C. B.

10. This is the covenant I will make after those days—"after the Mosaic dispensation is abolished—I will put My laws in their minds—I will open their eyes, and enlighten their understanding, to see the true, full, spiritual meaning thereof. And write them on their hearts—so that they shall inwardly experience whatever I have commanded. And I will be to them a God—their all-sufficient portion, and exceeding great reward. And they shall be to Me a people—My treasure, My beloved, loving, and obedient children"—WESLEY.

"The first promise is that the Law shall be written on the heart, no more on mere outward tables of stone. Written on the heart it is first knowledge, and then impulse; its obedience follows as by a spiritual instinct. The apostle here comes in contact with the Pauline 'law of the Spirit' (Rom. 8. 2), but he nowhere connects this law of the heart with the Spirit. To this promise is attached the statement, I will be their God. That statement expresses the idea of a covenant between God and man; in those days this idea shall be verified, the covenant relation will be real between God and His people"—DAVIDSON.

11. "And they who are under this covenant (though in other respects they will have need to teach each other to their lives' end, yet) shall not need to teach every one his brother saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know Me—all real Christians—from the least to the greatest. In this order the saving knowledge of God ever did and ever will proceed; not first to the greatest, and then to the least. But 'the Lord shall save the tents,' the poorest, 'of Judah first, that the glory of the house of David,' the royal seed, 'and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem,' the nobles and the rich citizens, 'do not magnify themselves' (Zech. 12. 7)"—WESLEY.

"The second promise of universal knowledge may be regarded as the result of what was contained in the first promise, or it may be a mere expansion of the first. The words, They shall no more teach every man his fellow-citizen and brother, are not strictly part of the promise, but a graphic mode of describing the state of things when knowledge of God is universal. An external law can be known only to some, and these must be the teachers of others. A law written on the heart, like a universal principle of the mind, is known to all, no priest or prophet is required to teach it; and such classes disappear, or rather all the Lord's people are prophets (Num. 11. 29; Joel 2. 28); and as it is a law as well as knowledge, exhortation is not needed to the observance of it. This description, it need not be said, is ideal; the prophets in their delineations of the future Church always contemplate it in its perfect condition. (Comp. Joel 2. 28; Isa. 11. 9; 54. 13)"—DAVIDSON.

12. "For I will justify them, which is the root of all true knowledge of God. This, therefore, is God's method. First, a sinner is pardoned; then he knows God, as gracious and merciful; then God's laws are written on his heart: he is God's and God is his"—WESLEY.

The third promise, that of final forgiveness of sin, being introduced by the word for, is seen to be the basis of the preceding ones; and so the apostle regards it as virtually the whole promise on which the new covenant is enacted. (Ch. 10. 16, 17.) Here lay the defect of the first covenant and its ministry (ch. 9. 9; 10. 4, 11); and here the ministry of the new is more excellent (ver. 6; ch. 9. 14; 10. 14). Those thus forgiven have access to the very throne of God (ch. 4. 16; 10. 19); they know Him and can serve Him free from the consciousness of sin (ch. 9. 14), and with a true heart (ch. 10. 22).

13. In saying, A new covenant, He hath antiquated the first—"hath shown that it is disannulled, and out of date. Now that which is antiquated is ready to vanish away—as it did quickly after, when the Temple was destroyed"—WESLEY.

In that He saith, etc,—"rather, 'in saying, "new" He hath made the first old: now that which groweth old and is failing for age is nigh unto vanishing away.' The very language of the prophet contains a declaration of the speedy dissolution of the former covenant. If nigh unto vanishing at the time when Jeremiah wrote, well might it now be believed to have passed away"—MOULTON.

CHAPTER IX.

1. "The first covenant had ordinances of outward worship, and a worldly, visible, material sanctuary, or tabernacle. Of this sanctuary he treats, vers. 2–5; of those ordinances, vers. 6–10"—WESLEY.

"The subject commenced in the last chapter (vers. 1–6) is continued here. The mention of the 'more excellent ministry' led to the description of the new covenant with which it is united (vers. 6–13). This verse, then, attaches itself to the vers. 5 and 6 of ch. 8. Even the first (covenant), then, had ordinances of Divine service and its sanctuary, of this world. The 'service' is spoken of again in ver. 6; the 'ordinances' in ver. 10, where they are called 'carnal.' Very similar is the language here, for the words so emphatically standing at the close of the verse are probably descriptive, not of the 'sanctuary' only, but also of the 'ordinances.' Both place and ministrations belonged to this world, and thus stand in contrast with 'the heavenly things' of which the tabernacle was a token and shadow"—MOULTON.

2. The first—"the outward tabernacle—in which was the candlestick and the table—the shewbread, shown continually before God and all the people, consisting of twelve loaves, according to the number of the tribes, was placed on this table in two rows, six upon one another in each row. This candlestick and bread seem to have typified the light and life which are more largely dispensed under the gospel by Him who is the Light of the world, and the Bread of life"—WESLEY.

Tabernacle. "It must be carefully observed that the Epistle throughout refers to the tabernacle, and not once to the temples which succeeded it. Though they were formed on the same general model, their very nature and design necessitated changes of plan and detail which unfitted them for the writer's argument here. So far the Temple was a copy of the tabernacle, and so far only was it made 'after the pattern' that Moses had seen; and so far only was its symbolism of Divine and not human origin"—MOULTON. "The structure of thought is this: The old covenant had a sanctuary of its own, and that of a cosmic nature, for a tabernacle was constructed—first, the outer part, which was called the Holies or Holy Place, and then another part called the Holy of Holies. Three ornaments are enumerated as belonging to the outer tabernacle. The sacred writer proceeds to describe the inner division of the tabernacle"—DELITZSCH.

3. "The second veil divided the holy place from the most holy, as the first veil did the holy place from the courts"—WESLEY.

After the second veil—i.e. "behind," going in westward from the entrance. The second veil is what is usually called the veil (ch. 10. 20; Mark 15. 38); it is called second, because the entrance on the east of the holy place was also formed by a curtain, not a door. (Ex. 26. 36.) On the veil see Ex. 26. 31–33; 40. 3, 21.

4. Having the golden censer—"used by the high priest only, on the great day of atonement—and the ark, or chest, of the covenant—so called from the tables of the covenant contained therein. Wherein was the manna—the monument of God's care over Israel—and Aaron's rod—the monument of the regular priesthood—and the tables of the covenant—the two tables of stone, on which the ten commandments were written by the finger of God; the most venerable monument of all"—WESLEY.

Which had . . . censer—or "having . . . altar of incense." The word used has both meanings, but the latter sense is more probable here, on account of the important use made of this altar on the day of atonement (Lev. 16. 18–20; Ex. 30. 8–10); and though this actually stood in the holy place, the author fails to mention it when speaking of this. He uses the word "having" in a general sense, not to indicate the local position of the altar of incense, but its close connection with the ministry of the Holy of Holies on the day of atonement, of which he is speaking. In this he follows the precedent of the Old Testament itself.

5. And over it were the cherubim of glory—"over which the glory of God used to appear. Some suppose each of these had four faces, and so represented the Three-One God, with the manhood assumed by the Second Person. With outspread wings shadowing the mercy-seat—which was a lid or plate of gold covering the ark"—WESLEY.

"The cherubims—rather, 'the Cherubim,' since im is the Hebrew plural termination—of glory. Not 'the glorious Cherubim,' but 'the Cherubim of the Shechinah,' or cloud of glory. This was regarded as the symbol of God's presence, and was believed to rest between their outspread wings. (See 1 Sam. 4. 22; 2 Kings 19. 15; Hagg. 2. 7–9.) They were emblems of all that was highest and best in animated nature—the grandest products of creation combined in one living angelic symbol (Ezek. 10. 4)—upholding the throne of the Eternal as on 'a chariot,' and bending in adoring contemplation of the Moral Law as the revelation of God's will. Mercy-seat. The word probably meant no more than 'lid' or 'cover,' but the LXX. understood it metaphorically of the covering of sins or expiation, because the blood of the expiatory offering was sprinkled upon it. Of which we cannot now speak particularly—rather, 'severally,' 'in detail.' It was no part of the writer's immediate purpose to enter upon an explanation of that symbolism of the tabernacle which has largely occupied the attention of Jewish historians and Talmudists as well as of modern writers. Had he done so he would doubtless have thrown light upon much that is now obscure. But he is pressing on to his point, which is to show that even the most solemn and magnificent acts of the whole Jewish ritual—the ceremony of the day of atonement—bears upon its face the sign of complete transitoriness and inefficiency when compared with the work of Christ"—C. B.

6. Always—"every day"—accomplishing their services—lighting the lamps, changing the shewbread, burning incense, and sprinkling the blood of the sin-offerings"—WESLEY.

Now when these things were thus ordained, etc.—"better, 'And when these things have been thus prepared, into the first tabernacle the priests enter continually, accomplishing the services.' As has been already observed (ver. 2), the present tense is used throughout these verses (6–10), not because the writer refers to the services as still continuing, but because he is still tracing the ordinance of Scripture. It is of the tabernacle alone that he speaks. The words of ver. 4 would have been entirely incorrect in regard to the Temple of his day, in which the most holy place was empty"—MOULTON.

7. Errors—"that is, sins of ignorance, to which only those atonements extended"—WESLEY.

Errors—"lit. 'ignorances.' (See ch. 5. 2, 3; 7. 27.) By once in the year we must, of course, understand on one day of the year, viz. the tenth day of Tisri. On that day, according to Lev. 16, it was the duty of the high priest to enter the Holy of Holies twice—(1) with the incense and with the blood of the bullock, his own sin-offering (Lev. 16. 12–14); (2) with the blood of the same bullock and that of the goat, the sin-offering for the people (vers. 15–19)"—MOULTON. "The writer's purpose is to show how the highest act of the Levitical worship, the entrance of the high priest into the Holy of Holies, itself exhibited the imperfection of the covenant to which that worship belonged"—DELITZSCH.

8. The Holy Ghost evidently showing—"by this token—that the way into the holiest—into heaven—was not made manifest—not so clearly revealed—while the first tabernacle, and its service, were still subsisting—and remaining in force"—WESLEY.

That the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest—"rather, 'that the way into the sanctuary has not yet been made manifest.' By 'sanctuary,' or 'holy place,' is here meant the Holy of Holies; not, however, as existing upon earth, in type and figure, but in the sense of ch. 8. 2; 9. 24. These external arrangements show that the way into the holy place (of the tabernacle) is not open: by this the Holy Spirit, whose word we are reading, whenever we trace the injunctions of the Law, teaches this lesson, that the way into God's immediate presence is not yet manifest"—MOULTON.

9. Which—"tabernacle, with all its furniture and services—is a figure—or type, of good things to come—which cannot perfect the worshipper—neither the priest nor him who brought the offering—as to his conscience—so that he should be no longer conscious of the guilt or power of sin. Observe, the Temple was as yet standing"—WESLEY.

"The tabernacle itself is called a figure, or parable. It was a parable by which the evangelical and spiritual doctrines were taught; it was an appointed parable, because limited to a certain time, for the time then present, that is, until the bringing in of the things signified, to which it had this designed relation"—WATSON.

10. "They could not so perfect him, with all their train of precepts relating to meats and drinks, and carnal, gross, external ordinances; and were therefore imposed only till the time of reformation—till Christ came"—WESLEY.

"The statements of this passage, taken backwards, are mainly these—(1) The Old Testament offerings are ordinances having reference to the flesh, and of a class with meats and drinks and divers washings. (Comp. the parallel statement in regard to the priesthood, ch. 7. 16.) (2) Ordinances of this sort are ineffectual to purify the conscience and give the worshipper freedom of access into the presence of God. Such offerings must be provisional and temporary. (3) This imperfection of access and service and atonement is characteristic of the Old Testament or Levitical period. (4) The Mosaic tabernacle or place of service is an emblem of this condition of the Old Testament period. Its first division or holy place, the stated sphere of Old Testament ministration, though a certain approach to God's presence, is an obstacle to true access, standing as it does before the holiest, and by its veil barring the way to it; only by its removal is the holiest thrown open; in other words, only by the removal of the Levitical system is access to God's true presence obtained"—DAVIDSON.

11. A High Priest of good things to come—"described, ver. 15. Entered through a greater, that is, a more noble, and perfect tabernacle—namely, His own body. Not of this creation—not framed by man, as that tabernacle was"—WESLEY.

A High Priest of good things to come. "Another and perhaps better reading is 'of the good things that have come' (γενομένων B, D, not μελλόντων). The writer here transfers himself from the Jewish to the Christian standpoint. The 'good things' of which the Law was only the 'shadow' (ch. 10. 1) were still future to the Jew, but to the Christian they had already come. By a greater and more perfect tabernacle—the preposition dia rendered 'by' may mean either 'through'—in which case 'the greater and better tabernacle' means the outer heavens through which Christ (anthropomorphically speaking) passed (see ver. 24 and ch. 4. 14); or 'by means of'—in which case 'the better tabernacle' is left undefined, and may here mean either the human nature in which for the time 'He tabernacled' (ch. 10. 20; John 1. 14; 2. 19; Col. 2. 9; 2 Cor. 5. 1), or as in ch. 8. 2, the ideal Church of the firstborn in heaven (comp. Eph. 1. 3). Not made with hands—because whatever tabernacle is specifically meant it is one which 'the Lord pitched, not man'"—C. B.

12. The holy place—"heaven—for us—all that believe"—WESLEY.

By the blood of goats and calves—"'by means of the blood of goats and calves' (this is the order of the words in the best MSS.). It is not meant that the sacrifices of the old covenant were useless, but only that when they were regarded as meritorious in themselves—apart from the faith and the grace of God, by which they could be blessed to sincere and humble worshippers—they could neither purge the conscience, nor give access to God. When the Prophets speak of sacrifices with such stern disparagement they are only denouncing the superstition which regarded the mere opus operatum as sufficient apart from repentance and holiness. (Hos. 6. 6; Isa. 1. 10–17, etc.) By His own blood—His own blood was the offering by which He was admitted as our High Priest and Eternal Redeemer into the Holy of Holies of God's immediate presence. (Ch. 13. 20; Rev. 5. 6)"—FARRAR.

13. If the ashes of an heifer—"consumed by fire as a sin-offering, being sprinkled on them who were legally unclean—purified the flesh—removed that legal uncleanness, and readmitted them to the Temple and the congregation"—WESLEY.

14. How much more shall the blood of Christ—"the merit of all His sufferings. Who through the Eternal Spirit—the work of redemption being the work of the whole Trinity. Neither is the Second Person alone concerned even in the amazing condescension that was needful to complete it. The Father delivers up the kingdom to the Son; and the Holy Ghost becomes the gift of the Messiah, being, as it were, sent according to His good pleasure. Offered Himself—infinitely more precious than any created victim, and that without spot to God. Purge our conscience—our inmost soul—from dead works—from all the inward and outward works of the devil, which spring from spiritual death in the soul, and lead to death everlasting—to serve the living God—in the life of faith, in perfect love and spotless holiness"—WESLEY.

"Christ entered the true holiest place by His own blood. He offered Himself. The High Priest is the sacrifice. Under the old covenant the victim must be without spot. But the high priest was not without blemish, and he offered for himself as well as for the errors of the people. But in the offering of Christ, the spotless purity of the Victim ensures that the High Priest Himself is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners. For this reason it is said here that He offered Himself through an Eternal Spirit, or, as we should say in modern phrase, 'through His Eternal Personality.' He is the High Priest after the order of Melchizedec; and He invests the sacrifice with all the personal greatness of the High Priest. Is He 'without beginning of days or end of life'? So also His sacrifice abides for ever. His power of an indissoluble life belongs to His atonement. Is He untouched by the rolling stream of time? His death was of infinite merit in reference to the past and to the future, though it took place historically at the end of the ages. His eternal personality made it unnecessary for Him to suffer often since the foundation of the world. Because of His personal greatness it sufficed that He should suffer once only and enter once into the holiest place. The eternal High Priest in one transitory act of death offered a sacrifice that remains eternally, and obtains for us an eternal redemption"—EDWARDS. "The purpose of this justifying and sanctifying operation of the blood of Christ is to produce a living witness of its reality, in a life of holy service. The man ceremonially cleansed and externally atoned for under the Old Testament had at once a right to join in the outward worship of God and the outward common life of the congregation of Israel, although no inward change may have passed over him; but he who has been reconciled and cleansed by the inward operation of the blood of Christ stands henceforth in living communion with God his Saviour, and is empowered to serve the living God with living works and inward service"—DELITZSCH.

15. And for this end He is the Mediator of a new covenant, that they who are called—"to the engagements and benefits thereof—might receive the eternal inheritance promised to Abraham: not by means of legal sacrifices, but of His meritorious death. For the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant—that is, for the redemption of transgressors from the guilt and punishment of those sins which were committed in the time of the old covenant. The article of his death properly divides the old covenant from the new"—WESLEY.

"For the new testament we must certainly read 'a new covenant': whatever may be thought of the following group of verses, the rendering 'testament' has no place here. The leading thought of ch. 8. is the establishment of a new covenant, and the former covenant has been referred to three times in this very chapter (vers. 1, 4). That by means of death—rather, 'that, death having taken place for redemption from the transgressions,' etc. The first covenant had been broken by 'transgressions': unless there be redemption from these—that is, from the bondage penalty which has resulted from these—there can be no promise and no new covenant. In respect of this bondage, this penalty, the death of Christ was a ransom—an offering to God looked at in the light of a payment in the place of death, service, or penalty due. When debt and payment are changed into the corresponding ideas of sin and punishment, the ransom gives place to the sin-offering, of which the principle was the acknowledgment of death deserved, and the vicarious suffering of death. So far our thought has rested on the removal of the results of the past. The covenant and the promise relate to the establishment of the better future. Death was necessary alike for both. The offering of Christ's life (Matt. 20. 28) was a ransom or an offering for sin; it was also a sacrifice inaugurating a new covenant"—MOULTON. "This verse attaches itself closely to the preceding context, and points back to the main thought contained in vers. 9–14; just for this reason, that the sacrifice of Christ accomplishes that which the Levitical sacrifices are unable to accomplish; namely, that, presented by virtue of Eternal Spirit, brings in an eternal redemption; these, on the other hand, as ordinances of the flesh, are able to effect only purity of the flesh"—LUNEMANN.

16. "I say by means of death; for where such a covenant is, there must be the death of him by whom it is confirmed—seeing it is by his death that the benefits of it are purchased. It seems beneath the dignity of the apostle to play upon the ambiguity of the Greek word, as the common translation supposes him to do"—WESLEY.

Death of the testator—or, "of him who made it" (not "makes"). The statement is general, and of a fact which anyone knows. This general statement is meant to be applied in illustration of the death of the Son (ver. 15).

17. After he is dead. "Neither this, nor 'after men are dead' is a literal translation of the words. It is a very perplexed passage"—WESLEY.

"After men are dead—lit. 'over dead.' Here, again, as the author is illustrating the one point of the necessity of a death, he uses phraseology somewhat indefinite—'in the case of the dead'—the testator liveth; or, 'for it is of no force while he that made it liveth.' The words may also be taken as a question, 'for hath it ever force while,' etc.? In ver. 15, Jesus was called Mediator. This word must be taken in a full sense as meaning one with powers to make the arrangements of the covenant. In ver. 16 He is alluded to as making the testament or covenant conveying an inheritance. All things connected with the making of the covenant or the disposing of the inheritance are put into His hand. In a sense the inheritance which we are to receive was committed to Him by God. Through Him we receive it. And we receive it in the way inheritance is received among men, by the death of Him who makes the testamentary disposition. (Comp. Luke 22. 15, 16, 19, 30—I dispone unto you as My Father disponed unto Me a kingdom.) This is the only idea illustrated"—DAVIDSON.

18. Whence neither was the first—"the Jewish covenant, originally transacted without the blood of an appointed sacrifice"—WESLEY.

The reference is to the great covenant sacrifice of Ex. 24, which followed immediately on the promulgation of the Sinaitic code of laws (ch. 19–23), then first committed to writing in the "book of the covenant."

19. He took the blood of calves—"or heifers—and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop. All these circumstances are not particularly mentioned in that chapter of Exodus, but are supposed to be already known from other passages of Moses. And the book itself—which contained all he had said. And sprinkled all the people—who were near him. The blood was mixed with water to prevent its growing too stiff for sprinkling; perhaps also to typify that blood and water (John 19. 34)"—WESLEY.

And of goats. "This is not specially mentioned, but it may be supposed that 'goats' were among the burnt-offerings mentioned in Ex. 24. 5. Water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop — these again are not mentioned in Ex. 24. 6, but are perhaps added from tradition on the analogy of Num. 19. 6; and Lev. 14. 4–6. Hyssop—the dry stalks of a plant resembling marjoram. Both the book—see Ex. 24. 6–8, where, however, it is not specially mentioned that the book was sprinkled. The Jewish tradition was that it lay upon the altar. The 'book' seems to have been the written record of what was uttered to Moses in Ex. 20. 22–23. 33. This is one of several instances in which the writer shows himself learned in the Jewish legends (Hagadoth)"—C. B. This verse is historic proof for the assertion in ver. 18, with free reference to Ex. 24. 3–8.

20. Saying, This is the blood of the covenant which God hath enjoined me to deliver unto you—"by this it is established"—WESLEY.

This is—"in the Hebrew 'Behold!' Some have supposed that the writer adopted the variation from a reminiscence of our Lord's words, 'This is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins' (Matt. 26. 28). But if such a reference or comparison had been at all present to his mind, he would hardly have been likely to pass it over in complete silence. Which God hath enjoined unto you—rather, 'which God commanded with regard to you,' i.e. which (covenant) Jehovah commanded me to deliver to you"—C. B.

21. "And in like manner he ordered the tabernacle—when it was made, and all its vessels, to be sprinkled with blood once a year"—WESLEY.

The main point is this; that in both cases the dedication did not take place without the employment of sacrificial blood.

22. And almost all things — "for some were purified by water or fire—are according to the Law purified with blood—offered or sprinkled. And, according to the Law, there is no forgiveness of sins without shedding of blood. All this pointed to the blood of Christ effectually cleansing from all sin, and intimated, there can be no purification from it by any other means"—WESLEY.

And almost all things. "The meaning of the word 'almost,' as it stands in the Greek, is rather, 'One may almost lay down the rule.' 'One may almost say.' What follows, in both parts of the verse, is a general saying, modified by these introductory words. 'And one may almost say—according to the Law, all things are cleansed in blood, and apart from the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness.' To the first rule an exception is found in the various purifications by water or by fire (see Num. 31. 22–24); to the second in the remarkable law of Lev. 5. 11–13. The expression 'in blood' is used because sprinkling with the blood of the slain victim was in figure a surrounding with, or inclusion within, the purifying element. On 'cleansed' the best comment is found in Lev. 16. 19, 30; on 'forgiveness,' in the words which in Lev. 4. are repeatedly (vers. 20, 26, 31, 35) used of the effect of the sin-offering, 'it shall be forgiven him.' The second clause of the verse is founded on Lev. 17. 11. By shedding of blood we must probably understand the slaying of the animal, rather than the pouring out of the blood by the altar (Lev. 4. 34, et al.). With these words compare Luke 22. 20"—MOULTON.

23. Therefore—"that is, it plainly appears from what has been said—it was necessary—according to the appointment of God—that the tabernacle and all its utensils, which were patterns, shadowy representations, of things in heaven, should be purified by these—sacrifices and sprinklings. But the heavenly things themselves—our heaven-born spirits (what more this may mean we know not yet)—by better sacrifices than these—that is, by a better sacrifice, which is here opposed to all the legal sacrifices, and is expressed plurally, because it includes the signification of them all, and is of so much more eminent virtue"—WESLEY.

From the premises laid down in the preceding verse, a twofold consequence is drawn in this,—the main stress being laid on its second part. "If the one is or was necessary, then must the other be or have been necessary too"—DELITZSCH.

24. For Christ did not enter into the holy place made with hands. "He never went into the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem, the figure of the true tabernacle in heaven (Heb. 8. 2). But into heaven itself, to appear in the presence of God for us—as our glorious High Priest and powerful Intercessor"—WESLEY.

"The connection by for is with the last words of ver. 23. Better sacrifices were needful when the true tabernacle was to be purified, the sacrifice of the Son, as has taken place (ver. 15). Two ideas are combined: if the heavenly things were to be purified, a better sacrifice was necessary; and, this better sacrifice has been offered, evidence of which is the fact, as we know from His ascension, that Jesus entered into the heaven itself. Is not entered into the holy places—or, 'entered not into a holy place, a figure' (lit. 'antitype') of the true. Heaven itself is the highest or farthest heaven, true abode of God; a heaven transcending all created space. Now to appear, etc.—or 'now to be manifested' (to) before the face of God. To be manifested is to enter into God's immediate and full view; but as God views immediately the face of the Son, He with equal immediateness views the face of God. The word expresses the single act of entering in and manifesting Himself unto God. 'Now' implies that this condition of manifestation continues"—DAVIDSON.

26. For then He must often have suffered from the foundation of the world. "This supposes — (1) that by suffering once He atoned for all the sins which had been committed from the foundation of the world; (2) that He could not have atoned for them without suffering. At the consummation of the ages. The sacrifice of Christ divides the whole age or duration of the world into two parts, and extends its virtue backward and forward, from this middle point wherein they meet, to abolish both the guilt and power of sin"—WESLEY.

"The apostle makes the offering and the suffering identical; declares that it was made but once, and states that in it the penalty due to the sin of many was endured. The reference, therefore, is not to the perpetual oblation which Christ is supposed to present 'in His eternal state or condition,' but to the one vicarious and sacrificial act on the cross"—TREFFRY.

27. After this, the judgment—"of the great day. At the moment of death every man's final state is determined. But there is not a word in Scripture of a particular judgment immediately after death"—WESLEY.

"More literally, And as there is laid up for men once to die, and after this judgment. Man's life and works on earth end with death: what remains is the result of this life and these works, as determined by God's 'judgment.' Man does not return to die a second time"—MOULTON.

28. "Christ having once died to bear the sins—the punishment due to them—of many—even as many as are born into the world—will appear the second time—when He comes to judgment—without sin—not as He did before, bearing on Himself the sins of many, but to bestow everlasting salvation"—WESLEY.

"The parallelism of these verses is man dies once, and is judged; Christ died once and shall return—he might have said 'to be man's judge' (Acts 17. 31)—but he does say, He shall return . . . for salvation. We may sum up some of the contrasts of this and the previous chapter as follows. The descendants of Aaron were but priests; Christ, like Melchisedec, was both Priest and King. They were for a time: He is a Priest for ever. They were but links in a long succession, inheriting from forefathers, transmitting to dependants; He stands alone, without lineage, without successor. They were established by a transitory ordinance, He by an eternal oath. They were sinful, He is sinless. They weak, He all-powerful. Their sacrifices were ineffectual, His was perfect. Their sacrifices were offered daily, His once for all. Theirs did but cleanse from ceremonial defilement,

His purged the conscience. Their tabernacle was but a copy, and their service a shadow; His tabernacle was the Archetype, and His service the substance. They died and passed away; He sits to intercede for us for ever at God's right hand. Their covenant is doomed to abrogation; His, founded on better promises, is to endure unto the end. Their high priest could but enter once and that with awful precautions, with the blood of bulls and goats, into a material shrine; He, entering with the blood of His one perfect sacrifice into the heaven of heavens, has thrown open to all the right of continual and fearless access to God. What a sin then was it, and what a folly, to look back with apostatising glances at the shadows of a petty Levitism, while Christ, the Mediator of a new, of a better, of a final dispensation—Christ whose blood had a real and no mere symbolic efficacy—had died once for all, and alone for all, as the sinless Son of God, to obtain for us an eternal redemption, and to return for our salvation as the everlasting Victor over sin and death!"—FARRAR.

CHAPTER X.

1. "FROM all that has been said, it appears that the Law, the Mosaic dispensation, being a bare, unsubstantial shadow of good things to come, of the gospel blessings, and not the substantial, solid image of them, can never with the same kind of sacrifices, though continually repeated, make the comers thereunto perfect, either as to justification or sanctification. How is it possible that any who consider this should suppose the attainments of David, or any who were under that dispensation, to be the proper measure of gospel holiness; and that Christian experience is to rise no higher than Jewish?"—WESLEY.

"The latter part of the ninth chapter was an expansion of vers. 11, 12. In particular, vers. 23-28 have been occupied with the theme, 'Christ entered once for all into the holy place, having won eternal redemption.' The repeated offerings presented by the high priests have been contrasted with the sacrifice which He has offered. To this thought the opening verses of this chapter attach themselves, explaining more fully the inefficacy of the one, the power and virtue of the other. Gradually the main thoughts of the preceding chapters are gathered up, and the last and chief division of the argument of the Epistle is brought to a close in ver. 18. A shadow of good things to come. These words have already come before us; the 'shadow' in ch. 8. 5, and the 'good things to come' in the ordinary reading of ch. 9. 11. Not the very image. The antithesis is hardly what we should have expected. The word 'image' is indeed consistent with the very closest and most perfect likeness; but why is the contrast to 'shadow' expressed by a word which cannot denote more than likeness, and not by a reference to the things themselves? The answer would seem to be that, from the very nature of the 'good things to come,' the Law could not be conceived of as having the things themselves; but had it possessed 'the very image' of them, a representation so perfect might have been found to bring with it equal efficacy"—MOULTON.

2. "They who had been once perfectly purged, would have been no longer conscious either of the guilt or power of their sins"—WESLEY.

Once purged . . . conscience of sin—or, "once purified." As there is a single offering for sin, so there is thereby a single act of purifying or cleansing the conscience. The conscience once purified, i.e. the consciousness of sin once removed, the people are free from the sense of sin. This of course refers to sin in that sense in which sacrifice removes it, not to sin as a moral condition of the mind. Further, the reference here is to the conscience of the people, because it is the people of God, as a people, that is sanctified (ch. 13. 12).

3. "There is a public commemoration of the sins both of the last and of all the preceding years; a clear proof that the guilt thereof is not perfectly purged away"—WESLEY.

"A remembrance of sins—or, 'a remembrance made of sins.' The continual sacrifice was a constant making remembrance of sin, and testimony to the abiding conscience of it, and proof that the sacrifices failed to take it away. This view of sacrifices—that they are 'a calling to mind of sins yearly'—is very remarkable. It seems to be derived from Num. 5. 15, where the 'offering of jealousy' is called 'an offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance.' Philo also speaks of sacrifices as providing 'not an oblivion of sins, but a reminding of them.' But if the sacrifices thus called sins to remembrance, they also daily symbolised the means of their removal, so that when offered obediently, with repentance and faith, they became valid symbols"—C. B.

4. It is impossible the blood of goats should take away sins—"either the guilt or the power of them"—WESLEY.

"This verse explains those which precede. No inconsistency really belonged to these sacrifices and this ceremonial, though so often repeated; for it was impossible that any such sacrifice should really remove sin. The offering was necessary, and it answered its purpose; but it could not remove the necessity for another and a better offering"—MOULTON. "Proof that it cannot be otherwise drawn from the matter itself which is under consideration. By a rudely sensuous means we cannot attain to a high spiritual good"—LUNEMANN. "It is not possible, etc. This plain statement of the nullity of sacrifices in themselves, and regarded as mere outward acts, only expresses what had been deeply felt by many a worshipper under the old covenant. It should be compared with the weighty utterances on this subject in the Old Testament. (1 Sam. 15. 22; Isa. 1. 11-17; Jer. 6. 20; 7. 21-23; Amos. 5. 21-24; Micah 6. 6-8; Ps. 40. 6-8 (quoted in the next verses); and Ps. 50 and 51; and, above all, Hos. 6. 6, which, being a pregnant summary of the principle involved, was a frequent quotation of our Lord.) Any value which the system of sacrifices possessed was not theirs intrinsically (propriâ virtute), but relatively and typically (per accidens). 'By a rudely sensuous means,' says Luuemann, 'we cannot attain to a high spiritual good.' Philo, in one of his finest passages, shows how deeply he had realised that sacrifices were valueless apart from holiness, and that no mere external acts can cleanse the soul from moral guilt. He adds that God accepts the innocent even when they offer no sacrifices, and delights in unkindled altars if the virtues dance around them"—C. B.

5. When He cometh into the world. "In the fortieth Psalm the Messiah's coming into the world is represented. It is said 'into the world,' not into the tabernacle (Heb. 9. 1), because all the world is interested in His sacrifice. A body hast thou prepared for Me—that I may offer up Myself"—WESLEY.

"Wherefore when He cometh. 'Wherefore,' i.e. such being the ineffectiveness of the sacrifices of the Law and men's condition under it. When He cometh—lit. 'coming,' refers to the Son. 'Coming into the world' does not seem to refer to the time prior to His coming, for in this case a body didst Thou prepare Me would not describe anything actual, but only a purpose, which is unlikely. Nor is the reference to the time before the Son's entry upon His official life, as if coming into the world could mean entering upon a public career in the world. The words rather contrast the Son's two states, His heavenly and His state in the flesh, and describe Him under the aspect of the latter. No point of time in His earthly life is specially referred to, but the state of His mind or consciousness is pictured towards God, having in it two points: first, Thou didst not will offerings of beasts, Thou didst prepare Me a body; and, second, I am come to do Thy will (implied in preparing Him a body)"—DAVIDSON.

7. In the volume of the book—"in this very Psalm—it is written of Me. Accordingly, I come to do Thy will—by the sacrifice of Myself"—WESLEY.

(See Ps. 40.) "The words it is written of Me may mean in the Hebrew 'it has been prescribed to Me,' and others take the clause to mean, 'I am come with the roll of the book which is written for Me.' If we ask, What was the book to which the author of the Psalm referred, the answer is not easy; it may have been the Law, or the book of God's unwritten counsels, as in Ps. 139. 16; the writer of the Epistle, transferring and applying David's words to Christ, thought doubtless of the whole Old Testament. (Comp. Luke 24. 26, 27)"—FARRAR.

8. Above when He said, Sacrifice Thou hast not chosen—"that is, when the psalmist pronounced those words in His name"—WESLEY.

"For the very reason that God's will and desire is not set on material sacrifices, the coming Christ declares His readiness to make an offering of Himself in order to accomplish that will"—DELITZSCH.

9. Then said He—"in that very instant He subjoined—Lo, I come to do Thy will—to offer a more acceptable sacrifice; and by this very act He taketh away the legal, that He may establish the evangelical, dispensation"—WESLEY.

He taketh away the first, that He may establish the second. "It is important to inquire how this is done, first in the case of the writer of the Psalm, then as the words are used of Jesus. David perceiving that that which God seeks is the subjection of man's will, refuses to rest in the sacrifices of the Law. No one will think that burnt-offering or gift or sacrifice for sin was henceforth at an end for him: the confession of his iniquities (ver. 12) implied a recourse to the appointed means of approach to God: even the sacrifices themselves were taken up into the service of obedience. But to the symbols shall be added the consecration and the sacrifices of praise (Ps. 50. 23) which they typified. The application to the Saviour must be interpreted by this context). In making these words His own, He declares the sacrifices of the Law to be in themselves without virtue; Jehovah seeks them not from Him, but, having prepared a human body for Him, seeks only the fulfilment of His will. But included in that will of God was Christ's offering of Himself for the world; and, on the other hand, it was His perfect surrender of Himself that gave completeness to that offering. His death was at once the antitype of the sacrifice for sin and the consummation of the words, I am come to do Thy will, O God. Hence, in saying, Lo, I am come to do Thy will (that which God has really willed), He taketh away the sacrifices of slain animals that He may establish the doing of God's will. That such sacrifices as were formerly offered are no longer according to God's pleasure follows as an inference from this"—MOULTON.

10. By which will—"of God, done and suffered by Christ—we are sanctified—cleansed from guilt, and consecrated to God"—WESLEY.

By the which will we are sanctified—"better, 'in which will we have been sanctified.' In the last verse we read of that which Jesus established—the doing of the will of God. He did that will when He offered the sacrifice of His perfect obedience—'obedience as far as death' (Phil. 2. 8). In this will of God which He accomplished lies our sanctification, effected through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. In ch. 9. 13, 14 the efficacy of the blood of Christ to cleanse the conscience is contrasted with the power of the offerings of the Law to 'sanctify in regard to cleanness of the flesh': here the real sanctification is joined with 'the offering of the body of Jesus Christ.' In the word 'body' lies a reference to ver. 8, where the body is looked on as the instrument of obedient service (comp. Rom. 12. 1); but the word 'offering' still preserves its sacrificial character, and contains an allusion to the presentation of the body of the slain victim. (Comp. ch. 13. 11.) As this offering has been presented 'once for all' (ch. 7. 27; 9. 12), so 'once for all' has the work of sanctification been achieved"—MOULTON.

11. Every priest standeth—"as a servant in an humble posture"—WESLEY.

MENKEN says: "The priest of the Old Testament stands timid and uneasy in the holy place, anxiously performing his awful service there, and hasting to depart when the service is done, as from a place where he has no free access, and can never feel at home; whereas Christ sits down in everlasting rest and blessedness at the right hand of majesty in the Holy of Holies, His work accomplished, and He awaiting its reward" (ver. 12).

12, 13. But He—"the virtue of whose one sacrifice remains for ever—sat down—as a Son, in majesty and honour"—WESLEY.

"It is the enthronement for eternity. Christ is no longer indeed a ministering, but a ruling Priest—a royal Priest—a Priest, in fact, after the order of Melchisedec. By the enemies are to be understood all opposing powers. (1 Cor. 15. 23–26.) For their subjection He will wait all the remaining time till the end of the present world, in whose history the great turn was made by His great self-sacrifice (ch. 9. 26). That end will consist in His second advent (ch. 9. 28), when the victory accomplished by His death and resurrection will be fully realised by the separation, binding, and elimination of everything in the universe opposed to God in the order described by S. Paul. (1 Cor. 15)"—DELITZSCH.

14. He hath perfected them for ever—"that is, has done all that was needful in order to their full reconciliation with God"—WESLEY.

(See ch. 7. 11, 25.) Those who submit themselves to the gracious rule of the high-priestly King, find in Him all that they need for their perfecting. He has provided all that they can require by His one self-sacrifice; they can add nothing to His perfect work.

15-17. "In this and the three following verses, the apostle winds up his argument concerning the excellency and perfection of the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ. He had proved this before by a quotation from Jeremiah; which he here repeats, describing the new covenant as now completely ratified, and all the blessings of it secured to us by the one offering of Christ, which renders all other expiatory sacrifices, and any repetition of His own, utterly needless"—WESLEY.

Whereof the Holy Ghost—rather, "And the Holy Ghost." The words afford an additional evidence. The sentence formed by these verses in English is incomplete. It is probable that before ver. 17 some such words as "then He saith" should be understood. The passage (ch. 9. 15, etc.) began with showing that the offering of the Son being a final putting away of sin, was the dedication of a new covenant. This precise idea gradually assumed the form of an illustration of the finality of the Son's offering, with the consequence that it superseded all other offerings (ch. 9. 25 – 10. 18). Being the foundation of a new covenant, all sacrifices are superseded by it; for this is expressly intimated in prophecies regarding the new covenant (ver. 17); where sins are put away there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin.

18. Now where remission, etc. "That in Christ Jesus all our sins are once for all forgiven; that we have nothing to do but to receive this forgiveness in humble faith; and that when we fall into sin the covenant foundation still remains, and needs not the repetition of legal sacrifices to give it fresh validity—this indeed is the principal and fundamental prerogative of the new covenant; for 'where forgiveness of sins is, there is also life and salvation'"—LUTHER.

19. "Having finished the doctrinal part of his Epistle, the apostle now proceeds to exhortation, deduced from what has been treated of from Heb. 5. 4, which he begins by a brief recapitulation. Having therefore liberty to enter"—WESLEY.

"Having therefore boldness; therefore reposes on the finality of the Son's offering for sin (ch. 10. 1–18), which 'purges the conscience to serve the living God' (ch. 9. 14). Uniting himself with his readers, whom he calls 'brethren' (ch. 3. 1; 13. 22), the author proceeds, Let us (vers. 22, 23, 24; on 'boldness,' see ch. 3. 6) by the blood of Jesus. This belongs to the whole preceding clause, joyous confidence to enter. Christians do not enter the holiest with the blood of Jesus, for then they would be priests, anew opening up the way, whenever they approached, by a new offering; the view of the passage is that the way is opened up once for all by the offering of the Son (ch. 9. 12, 28; 10. 12), and lies for ever open because He abides before the face of God for us (ch. 9. 24); and it is on this fact, called here the blood of Jesus, that the glad confidence of believers in regard to entrance is based"—DAVIDSON.

20. By a living way—"the way of faith, whereby we live indeed—which He hath consecrated — prepared, dedicated, and established for us. Through the veil, that is, His flesh. As by rending the veil in the Temple, the Holy of Holies became visible and accessible, so by wounding the body of Christ, the God of heaven was manifested, and the way to heaven opened"—WESLEY.

"This beautiful allegorising of the veil cannot, of course, be made part of a consistent and complete typology. It is not meant for this. But as the veil stood locally before the Holiest in the Mosaic tabernacle, the way into which lay through it, so Christ's life in the flesh stood between Him and His entrance before God, and His flesh had to be rent ere He could enter. This is the fact and the history which suggest the figure. But under this fact lie principles in the mind of God, and in the public law of the universe, and in the heart and mind of man, the object to be awakened and touched, which give to through a deeper sense, and in this sense, for us also the way lies through His flesh"—DAVIDSON. The way into the sanctuary of the Old Testament was simply a lifeless pavement trodden by the high priest and by him alone; the way opened by Jesus Christ is one that really leads and carries all who enter it into the heavenly rest, being in fact the reconciliation of mankind with God, once and for ever effected by Him through His ascension to the Father,—a "living way," because one with the living person and abiding work of Jesus Christ.

21. The best commentary on this verse is ch. 4. 14–16.

22. Let us draw near—"to God—with a true heart—in godly sincerity—having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience—so as to condemn us no longer — and our bodies washed with pure water — all our conversation spotless and holy, which is far more acceptable to God than all the legal sprinklings and washings"—WESLEY.

"The two conditions which the apostle reminds His readers that they possess are—hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, that is, a sense of sin removed by the offering of Christ (chaps. 9. 9; 10. 2, with 9. 14); and bodies washed with pure water. The heart and the body comprehend the whole man, inner and outer. The point lies in the purity of the water, making the body an organ of the inner life, equally pure with the life itself. The author may have had before his mind such passages as Ex. 29. 21; Lev. 8. 30, according to which priests were sprinkled with blood when dedicated to their office, and Ex. 29. 4; 30. 20; 40. 30, where they are said to have been washed with water, and where they are commanded to wash in the laver before entering the sanctuary. Two hindrances to service presented themselves. The sinfulness of the heart concentrated itself in the conscience, and hindered all free service; an evil conscience and a true heart are the opposites of one another. This hindrance was removed by the sprinkling. Defilements adhering to the body, or defilements considered under that aspect, were removed by washing. The language is borrowed from the external operations, and baptism, if it be alluded to, is brought into connection with the body, because it was in fact applied to it. The words picture one wholly purified for service, both without and within"—DAVIDSON.

"We Christians have and possess, in consequence of Christ's return to the Father, and His majestic session at God's right hand, a twofold position of privilege—(1) a right of entrance into the Divine sanctuary; and (2), as a consequence of having this right, a joyous confidence to avail ourselves of it"—DELITZSCH.

23. The profession of our hope—"the hope which we professed at our baptism"—WESLEY.

"Here is an exhortation to perseverance in Christian faith and hope, in order to the actual enjoyment of the great reward. We have a promise of eternal glory, as the reward of our perseverance. This promise is God's promise, not man's, and the promise of a faithful God, who cannot change; He is faithful that promised"—BURKITT.

24. "Gradually the writer passes from that which belongs to the individual (vers. 19, 20), to the mutual duties of a member of a community. Possibly he knew that amongst those whom he addresses there had existed provocations that did not tend toward brotherly love. The strict meaning may simply be, let us take note of one another, to stimulate one another to good works; but in the result, if not the expression, is included the converse thought, that we may ourselves be thus provoked"—MOULTON.

25. Not forsaking the assembling ourselves—"in public or private worship—as the manner of some is—either through fear of persecution, or from a vain imagination that they were above external ordinances. But exhorting one another—to faith, love, and good works—and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching—the great day is ever in your eye"—WESLEY.

"The command to publish the gospel includes the obligation of assembling to hear it. The name by which a Christian society is designated in Scripture is a Church, which signifies an assembly for the transaction of some business; and, in the case of a Christian assembly, the business must be necessarily spiritual, and include the sacred exercises of prayer, praise, and hearing the Scriptures"—WATSON. "The assembling of ourselves together — i.e. 'our Christian gatherings.' Apparently the flagging zeal and waning faith of the Hebrews had led some of them to neglect the Christian assemblies for worship and holy communion. (Acts 2. 42.) The word here used only occurs in 2 Thess. 2. 1, and is perhaps chosen to avoid the Jewish word 'synagogue,' and the more so because the duty of attending the 'synagogue' was insisted on by Jewish teachers. In the neglect of public worship the writer saw the dangerous germ of apostasy. Exhorting one another—this implies the duty of mutual encouragement. Ye see the day approaching. The day which Christians expected was the last day. (1 Cor. 3. 13.) They failed to see that the day which our Lord had primarily in view in His great eschatological discourse (Matt. 24) was the close of the old dispensation in the fall of Jerusalem. The signs of this were already in the air, and that approaching day of the Lord was destined to be 'the bloody and fiery dawn' of the last great day—the day of days, the ending-day of all days, the settling-day of all days, the day of the promotion of time into eternity, the day which for the Church breaks through and breaks off the night of this present world"—DELITZSCH.

26. For when we—"any of us Christians—sin wilfully—by total apostasy from God, termed 'drawing back' (ver. 38). After having received the experimental knowledge of the gospel truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins—none but that which we obstinately reject"—WESLEY.

For if we sin wilfully. "The word 'wilfully' stands in contrast with sins of weakness, ignorance, and error. If the writer meant to say that, after the commission of wilful and heinous sins, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, this would not only be the most terrible passage in Scripture, but would do away with the very object of redemption, and the possibility of any forgiveness of sins. But the meaning rather is, 'if we are willing sinners,' 'if we are in a state of deliberate and voluntary defiance to the will of God.' He is alluding, not only to those sins which the Jews described as being committed presumptuously 'with uplifted hand' (Num. 15. 30; Ps. 19. 13; see ch. 6. 4–8; 12. 16, 17), but to the deliberate continuity of such sins as a self-chosen law of life; as, for instance, when a man has closed against himself the door of repentance, and said, 'Evil be thou my good.' Such a state is glanced at in 2 Pet. 2. 20, 21; Matt. 12. 43–45. After that we have received the knowledge of the truth—rather, 'the full knowledge of the truth.' Something more is meant than mere historical knowledge. He is contemplating Christians who have made some real advance, and then have relapsed into 'desperation, or the wretchedness of unclean living.' There remaineth no more sacrifice for sin—lit. 'no sacrifice for sins is any longer left for them.' They have rejected the work of Christ, and it cannot be done for them over again. There is one atoning sacrifice, and that they have repudiated. He does not say that they have exhausted the infinite mercy of God, nor can we justly assert that he held such a conclusion; he only says that they have, so long as they continue in such a state, put themselves out of God's covenant, and that there are no other covenanted means of grace. For they have trampled under foot the offer of mercy in Christ, and there is no salvation in any other (Acts 4. 12)"—C. B.

27. But a certain fearful expectation of judgment and a fierceness of fire (R.V.). They who abandon "the people of God" are apostates for whom remaineth the jealous wrath of a devouring fire. (Comp. ch. 12. 29; Mal. 4.)

28. He that, in capital cases, despised (presumptuously transgressed) the Law of Moses died without mercy—without any delay or mitigation of his punishment"—WESLEY.

A man that hath set at nought Moses' Law dieth without compassion on the word of two or three witnesses (R.V.). "The reference is to Deut. 17. 2–7, the last words being a direct quotation from ver. 6 in that section. There the subject is apostasy from Jehovah to the worship of idols. That sin which, by the acknowledgment of all, had in ancient times robbed Israel of the name of God's people is tacitly placed by the side of the sin of those who forsake Christ"—MOULTON.

29. Of how much sorer punishment is he worthy, who—"by wilful, total apostasy. It does not appear that this passage refers to any other sin. Hath, as it were, trodden under foot the Son of God—a Lawgiver far more honourable than Moses—and counted the blood wherewith the better covenant was established—an unholy, a common worthless thing. By which he hath been sanctified—therefore Christ died for him also, and he was at least justified once. And done despite to the Spirit of grace—by rejecting all His motions"—WESLEY.

"The sin of apostasy from the new covenant is drawn in all its aggravation and meaning. It is (1) To tread under foot, that is, 'reject with public contumely' (ch. 6. 6) the Son of God, who revealed the covenant, and is its High Priest, and hath indeed been manifested (ch. 9. 26). (2) It is to count the blood of the covenant (ch. 9. 15–20), which belonged to the things most holy (Lev. 6. 29, etc.), unholy, that is, either 'common' ordinary blood, or even unclean, the blood of a malefactor; and to do this after experiencing its sanctifying influence (ch. 9. 14; 10. 10; 13. 12). (3) It is to do despite unto the Spirit of grace, the Holy Spirit. The 'Spirit of grace' may be the Spirit who imparts grace or who is the gift of grace. With the exception of ch. 2. 9 grace is spoken of in the Epistle, not as the principle in God from which the mission of the Son originates, but as the result of His death. Because He is our High Priest at God's right hand, the throne of God is a throne of grace (ch. 4. 16). They who fall from the faith of Christ turn away from the grace of God (ch. 12. 15). By grace, not meats, the heart is established (ch. 13. 9). Hence the Epistle closes with a prayer that 'grace be with all' (ch. 13. 25)"—DAVIDSON.

30. The Lord will judge His people—"yea, far more rigorously than the heathens, if they rebel against Him"—WESLEY.

We know—such is the main thought here—the judicial earnestness and severity of God: that earnestness, that severity, is testified to in God's own word, in Holy Scripture.

31. To fall into the hands—"of His avenging justice"—WESLEY.

"The hands of God are His almighty operation, whether in love or wrath. The energy of His action is measured by the absoluteness of His energy of life. How fearful to fall into His punitive hands, who is at once Almighty and the ever-living One!"—DELITZSCH.

32. Enlightened—"with the knowledge of God and of His truth"—WESLEY.

"In the last six verses the writer has enforced his exhortation by an appeal to the danger of falling away, and the fearful consequences of unfaithfulness. From warning he now turns to encouragement, as in ch. 6; and here, as there, he thankfully recalls the earlier proofs which his readers had given of their Christian constancy and love. Let them call to mind and ever keep in remembrance what the grace of God had already enabled them to endure"—MOULTON.

33. Not companions only, but sharers of the lot of their persecuted brethren, both by sympathy and by voluntary association with their sufferings.

33. "For ye sympathised with all your suffering brethren, and with me in particular; and received joyfully the loss of your own goods"—WESLEY.

"In the spirit of Matt. 5. 12 (Acts 5. 41; 2. Cor. 12. 10), they accepted persecution not with 'patience and longsuffering' only, but 'with joy' (Col. 1. 11)."—MOULTON. By the spoiling of their goods, we are to understand what we find still at this day taking place in the sphere of the Jewish mission; when a Jew shows himself determined to become a Christian, he is disinherited by his relations, his share in the property is withheld from him, his credit and every source of gain is withdrawn; he falls into a state of destitution. But there is not wanting that state of mind which is expressed in the words, knowing that ye have in heaven a better property and an abiding.

35. Cast not away therefore this your confidence—"your faith and hope; which none can deprive you of but yourselves"—WESLEY.

"To cast away boldness is the opposite of 'holding fast the boldness of the hope' (ch. 3. 6.; the one belongs to the endurance of the faithful servant (vers. 32, 36), the other to the cowardice of the man who draws back (ver. 38). This verse and the next are closely connected. Hold fast your boldness, seeing that to it belongs great reward; hold it fast, for 'he that endureth to the end shall be saved'"—MOULTON.

36. The promise—"perfect love; eternal life"—WESLEY.

In these words we have an echo of Matt. 7. 21, where our Lord sums up His requirements from those who call themselves His in words which express the purpose of His own life (vers. 7, 9; John 4. 34). "Ye have need of patience—the continued exercise of patience; to perform difficult duties, to resist strong temptations, to wait for an answer to prayer. After we have done the will of God, we need patience to enable us to wait for the receiving of the promised good"—BURKITT.

37. He that cometh—"to reward every man according to his works"—WESLEY.

A little while—"rather, 'a very little while.' The expression is remarkable and unusual; it is evidently taken from Isa. 26. 20—"Come My people . . . hide thyself . . . for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast.' The subject of this passage, from which the one expressive phrase is taken, is the coming of Jehovah 'to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity'; in 'a little moment' shall the indignation consume His foes, then will He give deliverance to His people. Even this passing reference would serve to call up before the mind of the Hebrew readers the solemn associations of the prophecy—the promised salvation, the awful judgment"—MOULTON.

38. Now the just—"the justified person—shall live—in God's favour, a spiritual and holy life—by faith—as long as he retains that gift of God. But if he draw back—if he make shipwreck of his faith—My soul hath no pleasure in him—that is, I abhor him; I cast him off"—WESLEY.

"Here the apostle further enforces the lesson which he had inculcated in vers. 35, 36—the necessity of maintaining faith in full vigour, in order to the continued possession of spiritual life, and the ultimate attainment of the glory held forth to us"—WILLIAMS. "My righteous one will naturally mean 'my righteous servant'—the man who will not be seduced into wickedness; he shall live by his faithful trust, for salvation and life shall be given him by God Himself. In this context the word righteous recalls ver. 36, 'having done the will of God'"—MOULTON. But if any man draw back. "The introduction of the words 'any man' by the A.V. is wholly unwarrantable, and at first sight looks as if it were due to dogmatic bias and a desire to insinuate the Calvinistic doctrine of the 'indefectibility of grace.' But throughout this Epistle there is not a word which countenances the dogma of 'final perseverance.' The true rendering is 'And "if he draw back My soul approveth him not,"' i.e. 'if My just man draw back' (comp. Ezek. 18. 24, 'when the righteous turneth away from his righteousness'). The verb implies that shrinking from a course once begun which is used of S. Peter in Gal. 2. 12. It means, primarily, 'to strike or shorten sail,' and then to withdraw or hold back. (Comp. Acts 20. 20, 27)"—C. B.

39. We are not of them who draw back to perdition—"like him mentioned, ver. 38. But of them that believe—"to the end, so as to attain eternal life"—WESLEY.

"Lit. But we are not of drawing (or 'shrinking') back unto perdition, but of faith unto the gaining of the soul. On the last words (which are nearly identical with those of Luke 17. 33, though deeper in meaning), see the note on ver. 34. The exhortation thus closes with words of encouragement and hope"—MOULTON.

CHAPTER XI.

THIS chapter is very closely connected with the last verses of ch. 10. Those verses have taught the necessity of faith for the attainment of the promise. Here we read of men to whom, through their faith, the promise has been made sure.

1. "The definition of faith given in this verse, and exemplified in the various instances following, undoubtedly includes justifying faith, but not directly as justifying. For faith justifies only as it refers to, and depends on, Christ. But here is no mention of Him as the object of faith; and in several of the instances that follow, no notice is taken of Him or His salvation, but only of temporal blessings obtained by faith. And yet they may all be considered as evidences of the power of justifying faith in Christ, and of its extensive exercise in a course of steady obedience amidst difficulties and dangers of every kind. Now faith is the subsistence of things hoped for, the evidence or conviction of things not seen—things hoped for are not so extensive as things not seen. The former are only things future and joyful to us; the latter are either future, past, or present, and those either good or evil, whether to us or others. 'The subsistence of things hoped for'—giving a kind of present subsistence to the good things which God has promised: the Divine supernatural 'evidence' exhibited to, the conviction hereby produced in, a believer of 'things not seen,' whether past, future, or spiritual; particularly of God and the things of God"—WESLEY.

Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen (R.V.). "It has been debated whether that which follows is a definition of what faith is, or in reality a description of what faith does. It is not a complete definition, in the sense of including all the moments of thought which are present in the word as used in the last chapter (ver. 38) or in this. The things hoped for are not mere figments of the imagination; their basis is the word of God. If we keep this in mind, the words, still remaining general in their form, agree with all that has led up to them and with all that follows; and whether they be called definition or description will be of little consequence. The exact meaning of the special terms here used it is not easy to ascertain. The word rendered substance has already occurred twice in the Epistle. In ch. 1. 3 this was its true meaning—the essence which, so to speak, underlies, 'stands under,' the qualities possessed. In ch. 3. 14 the same metaphor of standing under is applied to steadfastness, confidence. To adopt Dr. Vaughan's clear explanation, 'Faith is that principle, that exercise of mind and soul, which has for its object things not seen, but hoped for, and which, instead of sinking under them as too ponderous, whether from their difficulty or from their uncertainty, stands firm under them—supports and sustains their pressure—in other words, is assured of, confides in and relies on them.' This interpretation yields an excellent sense, and has the advantage of assigning to the Greek word a meaning which it certainly bears in an earlier chapter, and in two places of S. Paul's Epistles. The whole verse, then, may be rendered, Now faith is the giving substance to what is hoped for, the testing of things not seen. And now passing away from the general aspect of the words to that in which they are presented by the context, we have as the meaning: Faith, holding to God's word, gives substance to what that word promises, investing the future blessings with a present existence, treating them as if already objects of sight rather than of hope. Through faith, guided by the same word, the things unseen are brought to the proof; what that word teaches, though future, or though belonging to a world beyond human sight, is received with full conviction. Thus 'every genuine act of faith is the act of the whole man, not of his understanding alone, not of his affections alone, not of his will alone, but of all three in their central, aboriginal unity.' And thus faith becomes 'the faculty in man through which the spiritual world exercises its sway over him, and thereby enables him to overcome the world of sin and death' (Hare's Victory of Faith)"—MOULTON.

2. By it the elders—"our forefathers. This chapter is a kind of summary of the Old Testament, in which the apostle comprises the designs, labours, sojournings, expectations, temptations, martyrdoms of the ancients. The former of them had a long exercise of their patience; the latter suffered shorter but sharper trials. Obtained a good testimony—a most comprehensive word. God gave a 'testimony,' not only of them but to them: and they received His testimony as if it had been the things themselves of which He testified (vers. 4, 5, 39). Hence they also gave testimony to others, and others testified of them"—WESLEY.

For by it the elders obtained a good report—lit. "For therein the elders had witness borne to them." Their "good report" was won in the sphere of faith. The elders—a technical Jewish term—means the ancient fathers of the Church of Israel (ch. 1. 1). WILLIAMS adds: "Faith was the all-pervading principle of their character; and this principle God stamped with His marked approval."

3. By faith we understand that the worlds—"Heaven and earth and all things in them, visible and invisible—were made—formed, fashioned, and finished—by the word—the sole command of God, without any instrument or preceding matter. And as creation is the foundation and specimen of the whole Divine economy, so faith in the creation is the foundation and specimen of all faith. So that things which are seen—as the sun, earth, stars—were made of things which do not appear—out of the dark, unapparent chaos (Gen. 1. 2). And this very chaos was created by the Divine power; for before it was thus created it had no existence in nature"—WESLEY.

Through faith. "In this chapter we find fifteen special instances of the work of faith, besides the summary enumeration in ver. 32 and following verses. We understand. 'We apprehend the reason.' (See Rom. 1. 20.) That the worlds were framed. The word for 'worlds' means literally ages (ch. 1. 2), i.e. the world regarded from the standpoint of human history. The 'time-world' necessarily presumes the existence of the space-world also. Were framed—'have been established' (ch. 13. 21; Ps. 74. 16; LXX.). By the word of God—rather, 'by the utterance of God,' namely by His fiat, as in Gen. 1.; Ps. 33. 6, 9; 2 Pet. 3. 5. There is no question here as to creation of the world by the Logos. So that things which are seen. The true reading and literal translation are 'so that not from things which appear hath that which is seen come into being,' a somewhat harsh way of expressing that 'the visible world did not derive its existence from anything phenomenal.' In other words, the clause denies the pre-existence of matter. It says that the world was made out of nothing, not out of the primeval chaos"—C. B.

4. By faith—"in the future Redeemer—Abel offered a more excellent sacrifice—the firstlings of his flock, implying both a confession of what his own sins deserved, and a desire of sharing in the great atonement—than Cain—whose offering testified no such faith, but a bare acknowledgment of God the Creator. By which faith he obtained both righteousness and a testimony of it; God testifying—visibly that his gifts were accepted; probably by sending fire from heaven to consume his sacrifice, a token that justice seized on the sacrifice instead of the sinner who offered it. And by it—by this faith—being dead, he yet speaketh—that a sinner is accepted only through faith in the great sacrifice"—WESLEY.

"Apart from the first words, by faith, there is nothing here said to explain the superiority of Abel's offering; though one who believes sacrifice to have been of Divine institution, and who notes the close connection between God's word and the actions of the men whose faith is here recorded, may hold it probable that Abel's obedience was manifested in his mode of approaching God. By which he obtained witness—probably, 'through which faith,' but the Greek may also mean 'through which sacrifice.' The witness is that borne by God in His acceptance of the offering (shown by some visible sign); we might also add that such a testimony to Abel is implied in the reproof of Cain (Gen. 4. 7), but the following words, God bearing witness over (or 'in regard to') his gifts show what was chiefly in the writer's thought. Such acceptance implied Abel's righteousness, and thus testified to his faith. It is remarkable that in three out of four places in which Abel is mentioned in the New Testament this epithet is used (Matt. 23. 35; 1 John 3. 12)"—MOULTON.

5. "Enoch was not any longer found among men, though perhaps they sought for him as they did for Elijah. (2 Kings 2. 17.) He had this testimony—from God in his own conscience"—WESLEY.

By reason of his faith Enoch was caught away—i.e. even during his lifetime was, like Elijah (2 Kings 2.), caught up to God in heaven. He hath had witness borne to him that he had been well-pleasing unto God (R.V.). (See Gen. 5. 21-24.)

6. But without faith—"even some Divine faith in God, it is impossible to please Him. For he that cometh to God—in prayer, or any other act of worship, must believe that He is"—WESLEY.

And without faith it is impossible to be well-pleasing unto Him (R.V.). "The very statement that Enoch pleased God is an assertion that in Him faith was found. No one can be the habitual worshipper of God (this is what the phrase implies) if his faith does not grasp these two truths. Is a rewarder—lit. 'becometh a recompenser' (ch. 2. 2; 10. 35); the future recompense is present to the eye of faith"—MOULTON.

7. Noah being warned of things not seen as yet—"of the future deluge. Moved with fear, prepared an ark, by which open testimony he condemned the world—who neither believed nor feared"—WESLEY.

"Noah, believing the Divine warning and promise, and fulfilling the Divine command, strange and unexampled as it might appear, amid the ridicule and mockery of a careless world, he became heir of the righteousness which is determined by and conditioned through faith."

—DELITZSCH. "In devout precaution, in that he reposed unconditional belief in the word of God, and on that very account took the enjoined measure of preparation in order to remain in safety under the impending destruction"—LUNEMANN.

9. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise—"the promise was made before (Gen. 12. 7). Dwelling in tents—as a sojourner—with Isaac and Jacob—who by the same manner of living showed the same faith. Jacob was born fifteen years before the death of Abraham—the joint-heirs of the same promise—having all the same interest therein. Isaac did not receive this inheritance from Abraham, nor Jacob from Isaac, but all of them from God"—WESLEY.

The land of promise—"more correctly, according to the true reading, 'a land of the promise': into a land which the promise (Gen. 12. 7) made his own, he came as a sojourner, and sojourned in it as in a land belonging to others, making his settled abode there in tents. The words of which this is a paraphrase are very expressive, especially those of the last clause. Abraham there 'made his home once for all, well aware that it was to be his home—expecting no change in this respect all his life long—in tents,' movable, shifting abodes—here to-day, there to-morrow—with (as did also in their turn) Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise"—DR. VAUGHAN.

10. He looked for a city which hath foundations—"whereas a tent has none—whose builder and former is God—of which God is the sole contriver, former, and finisher"—WESLEY.

A city which hath foundations—"rather, 'the city which hath the foundations.' The general thought is that which we find expressed in vers. 14–16. There, the strangers and pilgrims are seeking for a country of their own; here, the dweller in tents is waiting for the 'city.' that hath the foundations. All these verses clearly teach that the promise as apprehended by the patriarchs was not bounded by the gift of Canaan. Of what nature their expectations of the future life may have been we cannot tell; but this they knew, that their fellowship with God and their interest in His promises would not cease with this transient life. What they saw of earthly blessing was but the earnest of some greater gift still future, and yet present through the power of their faith. The shifting tent might be Abraham's home now, but he waited for that city which should never know change—of which alone it could be said that it hath 'the foundations,' and whose Architect and Maker is God. (Comp. Ps. 87. 1; Rev. 21)"—MOULTON. The idea of a heavenly Jerusalem was already current among the Jews; its descent to earth was expected on the arising of the Messiah.

11. Sarah also herself—"though at first she laughed at the promise (Gen. 18. 12)"—WESLEY.

"By faith she drew strength out of the Divine fulness, inasmuch as she accounted the God of the promise (comp. Rom. 4. 21) faithful to the promise (comp. ch. 10. 23). This faith of Sarah's, answering and supporting the faith of Abraham, was now gloriously rewarded; the promise was fulfilled in over-measure"—DELITZSCH.

12. As it were dead—"till his strength was supernaturally restored, which continued for many years after"—WESLEY.

The one is Abraham. (Comp. Rom. 4. 19; Isa. 51. 2; see Gen. 15. 5; 22. 17.) The comparison of the multitude of descendants to the stars of heaven, and the countless upon the seashore, is based upon the use of the same figures in the words of the promise given to Abraham. (Comp. Gen. 13. 16; 15. 5; 22. 17; 26. 4; 35. 12; Ex. 32. 13; Deut. 1. 10.)

13. All these—"mentioned vers. 7–11—died in faith—in death faith acts most vigorously. Not having received the promises—the promised blessings. Embraced—as one does a dear friend when he meets him"—WESLEY.

"These all died in faith—or, 'according to faith.' The reference is to Abraham and Sarah and their immediate descendants, not to Noah and those further back. The statement seems not to be the negative one, that they all died without having received the promises, still only in the region of faith, not in that of enjoyment; but the positive one, that their death, like their life, was according to faith; the emphasis falling on 'died'—all their life through, even up to death, was according to faith; in this state of mind as persons not having received the promises, but having, etc. (comp. vers. 14, 16), they died"—DAVIDSON.

14. They who speak thus show plainly that they seek their own country—"that they keep in view, and long for, their native home"—WESLEY.

That they seek a country—rather, "that they are seeking further after a native land." Hence comes the argument of the next verse, that it was not their old home in Chaldea for which they were yearning, but a heavenly native land.

15. If they had been mindful of—"their earthly country, Ur of the Chaldeans, they might have easily returned"—WESLEY.

They never attempted to return to Mesopotamia, because they were home-sick not for that land but for heaven.

16. But they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly. "This is a full convincing proof that the patriarchs had a revelation and a promise of eternal glory in heaven. Therefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: seeing He hath prepared for them a city—worthy of God to give"—WESLEY.

But now—that is, "as the case in truth is"—the country they desire—and which they show that they desire when they call themselves strangers in the land where they dwell —is a heavenly one. Wherefore . . . ashamed to be—or, "ashamed of them to be called." Seeing they desire a heavenly country, the abode of God, He is not ashamed to be called their God. (Comp. Gen. 28. 13; Ex. 3. 6; Matt. 22. 32; Luke 20. 37.) The phrase, "to be called their God," interprets, "not ashamed of them." Their desire for fellowship with Him He meets with a public avowal of His relation to them. For He hath prepared, etc.; proof or illustration that He is not ashamed—that is, that He is their God. He is their God, as is seen in His having prepared a city for them—His own city. Whether the writer means by "prepared," made ready merely in design as yet, or actually bestowed upon them, may be uncertain. (See ch. 12. 22, etc.)

17. By faith Abraham—"when God made that glorious trial of him—offered up Isaac—the will being accepted as if he had actually done it. Yea, he that had received the promises —particularly that grand promise, 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called.' Offered up—this very son; the only one he had by Sarah"—WESLEY.

"Yea, he that had gladly received the promises was offering up his only-begotten son (R.V.). As in former cases (ch. 4. 9; 7. 11; 10. 9), the reference is to the permanent record of Scripture, in which the fact related is ever present. Abraham stands before us there as having offered his son. It will be seen that the offering is spoken of as if consummated. As regards faith the sacrifice was indeed complete; the perfect surrender of will had been made, and the hand was stretched out for the deed"—MOULTON. "Abraham, in the obedience of faith, had entered the promised land, in the patience of faith, had spent many a long decade of his earthly pilgrimage therein; in the joy of faith, he had witnessed the fulfilment of the promise by which his long fruitless marriage had at last been crowned; and now the same faith must undergo its severest trial, in order that the victory of faith may be his also. The father of the faithful endured this trial, and came triumphant out of it"—DELITZSCH.

18. In Isaac shall thy seed be called —"from him shall the blessed seed spring"—WESLEY.

The phrase, In Isaac shall thy seed be called, means, "Through Isaac shall they come who shall be called (and be, in the sense of the promise) thy seed." Abraham had other descendants; his seed, in the pregnant sense of the promise, was to be through Isaac. Yet this his only son, the child of promise, Abraham is to sacrifice! "God appeared in all this," says S. CHRYSOSTOM, "to contradict God, faith to be opposed to faith, and commandment to commandment." But fearful as the paradox might seem, Abraham was obedient.

19. Accounting that God was able even to raise him from the dead—"though there had not been any instance of this in the world —from whence also—to speak in a figurative way — he did receive him — afterwards, snatched from the jaws of death"—WESLEY.

"This verse interprets and analyses 'by faith' of ver. 17, laying bare to us the mental process and operations which were 'faith.' Abraham realised the omnipotence of God, and trusted to it, believing that it could raise even from the dead. The original promise he firmly believed in also, and looked to the realising of it through God's power. This was a complicated and brilliant act of faith. Confusion might have been introduced into his mind through what seemed contradictory leading on the part of God. But his faith was able to realise the reconciliation. Faith in God's first promise and faith in God's power, made faith in the new command and obedience to it possible" —DAVIDSON.

20. Blessed. "Gen. 27. 27–39, prophetically foretold the particular blessings they should partake of. Jacob and Esau—preferring the elder before the younger"—WESLEY.

By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau. "It is true that the blessing of Esau when rightly translated, 'Behold, thy dwelling shall be away from the fatness of the earth and away from the dew of blessing' (Gen. 27. 39), reads more like a curse; but the next verse (40) involves a promise of ultimate freedom, and Esau obtained the blessings of that lower and less spiritual life for which he was alone fitted by his character and tastes. Concerning things to come. The true reading seems to be 'even concerning,' though it is not easy to grasp the exact force of the 'even'"—C. B.

21. Jacob when dying — "that is, when near death — bowing down on the top of his staff—as he sat on the side of his bed"—WESLEY.

Both the son—rather, "each of the sons." He made a marked difference between them. (Gen. 48. 17–19). Worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff. In this verse there is an allusion to two separate events. The first is the blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48. 1–20); the other an earlier occasion (Gen. 47. 29–31). In our version it is rendered "And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head." "Probably all that is meant is that, being too feeble to rise and kneel or stand, Jacob 'bowed himself upon the head of his couch,' in an attitude of prayer, just as the aged David did on his deathbed (1 Kings 1. 47)"—C. B.

22. Concerning his bones—"to be carried into the land of promise"—WESLEY.

Joseph. (Gen. 50. 24, etc.) Joseph's mind was also directed to the future and invisible, and the trustful state of his mind was shown by his mentioning the departure of Israel from Egypt; and in full faith that it would come about according to the promise, he gave commandment concerning his bones. (Comp. Josh. 24. 32.)

23. They saw—"doubtless with a Divine presage of things to come"—WESLEY.

Because they saw he was a proper child. "'Proper' has its now obsolete sense of 'handsome, comely,' a meaning not uncommon in Shakespeare. The word used in the Greek translation of Ex. 2. 2 is preserved both in Acts 7. 20 and in this place. It would seem that the remarkable beauty of the infant was understood by his parents as a Divine sign given for the guidance of their conduct. The next clause should probably be closely connected with this—'because they saw . . . and were not afraid of the king's commandment' (Ex. 1. 16). Their reliance on the protection of God enabled them to brave the anger of the king"—MOULTON.

24. Refuse to be called—"any longer"—WESLEY.

Come to years—"i.e. grown up, 'when he was full forty years old' (Acts. 7. 23). The words here used are taken from the Greek translation of Ex. 2. 11, where we first read of Moses as openly associating himself with his oppressed people. When Moses slew the Egyptian who was 'smiting a Hebrew, one of his brethren,' he in act 'refused to be called a son of Pharaoh's daughter,' and chose 'to suffer affliction with the people of God.' (See Ex. 2. 15)"—MOULTON.

25. Choosing—"better, 'having chosen.' This act was an expression of his deliberate choice. He joined his people because it was 'the people of God.' To stand aloof for the sake of ease and pleasure would for him have been apostasy from God (sin, comp. ch. 10. 26). The faith of Moses had brought 'conviction of the things not seen,' which 'are eternal'; hence he looked not at 'the things seen,' which are 'for a season' (2 Cor. 4. 18, where the same word is used)"—MOULTON.

26. The reproach of Christ—"that which he bore for believing in the Messiah to come, and acting accordingly. For he looked off—from all those perishing treasures, and beyond all those temporal hardships—unto the recompense of reward—not to an inheritance in Canaan; he had no warrant from God to look for this, nor did he ever attain it; but what his believing ancestors looked for—a future state of happiness in heaven"—WESLEY.

The reproach of Christ—"better, 'The reproach of the Christ.' Many explanations have been proposed of this remarkable phrase, some of which—as 'reproach for Christ,' 'reproach similar to that which Christ endured'—cannot possibly give the true meaning. The first point to be noted is that the words are almost exactly a quotation from one of the chief of the messianic psalms. (Ps. 89. 50, 51.) Here the writer in effect speaks of himself as bearing 'the reproach of the Anointed' of the Lord; pleading in His name and identifying himself with His cause. 'The Anointed' is the king who (see the note on ch. 1. 5) was the type of the promised Christ. Throughout the whole of their history the people of Israel were the people of Christ. Their national existence originated in the promise to Abraham, which was a promise of the Christ; and till the fulness of time should come their mission was to prepare the way for Him. The reproach which Moses accepted by joining the people of the promise was, therefore, 'the reproach of the Christ,' the type of that 'reproach' which in later days His people will share with Him (ch. 13. 13)"—MOULTON.

27. By faith he left Egypt—"taking all the Israelites with him. Not then fearing the wrath of the king—as he did many years before (Ex. 2. 14)"—WESLEY.

"This verse does not refer to Moses' wandering to Midian (Ex. 2. 15), where he indeed feared, but to the departure from Egypt (Ex. 14. 13.) That the two parts of which this departure consisted, namely, the Passover and the passage through the Red Sea, are afterwards specially mentioned, is no reason why the event as a whole might not also be mentioned first. The resolution in general to undertake the dangerous work of delivering Israel from Egypt was a strong act of faith. (Comp. Ex. 3. 11.) Moses had steadfastly before his eyes God, the invisible, just as if he saw Him"—EBRARD. Delitzsch gives a different opinion as to the time alluded to in this verse, and says that it refers to the flight into Midian. LUNEMANN'S explanation is: "The fear attributed to Moses in the narrative of the Pentateuch is quite different from that from which the Epistle to the Hebrews pronounces him free. The former fear had a merely objective character: it was simply a dread lest the consequences of a particular act might be fatal to himself, when he found that act had become known. But this kind of objective fear was quite compatible with the subjective fearlessness of which the Epistle speaks, in virtue of which Moses retained his conviction that God had chosen him to be the deliverer of His people, and feared not to renounce, amid all temptations to the contrary, his allegiance to an earthly king."

28. The pouring out of the blood—"of the paschal lamb, which was sprinkled on the door-posts, lest the destroying angel should touch the Israelites"—WESLEY.

"The celebration of the Passover and the sprinkling of the blood were acts of obedience, having reference to a danger as yet unseen, but present in God's word. (Ex. 12. 12.) Lest he that destroyed. (See Ex. 12. 21, 22, 28, 29.) Had the Israelites not believed that God would really slay the first-born, or had they had no faith in the atoning power of the lambs, they would not have marked their door-posts with the blood of the Passover lambs"—EBRARD.

29. "They—Moses, Aaron, and the Israelites—passed the Red Sea—it washed the borders of Edom, which signifies red. Thus far the examples are cited from Genesis and Exodus; those that follow are from the former and the latter prophets"—WESLEY.

Passage of the sea. The people's faith in the power of God and trust in their relation to Him led them to obey His command and commit themselves to the sea. (Ex. 14. 22; comp. Matt. 14. 25–33.) See also Isa. 51. 9, 10; and 43. 16, 17. "It was, on the one hand, the omnipotence of Jehovah which, by means of an east and north-east wind, swept a furrow through the waves of the Red Sea; and, on the other hand, it was the faith of Israel which, trusting in that omnipotence, passed through the twofold wall of waters, which at any moment might collapse upon them"—DELITZSCH.

30. "By the faith of Joshua"—WESLEY.

The fall of Jericho. (Josh. 6.) Here the faith of the whole people is again illustrated. They believe in the might of Jehovah, in His power to throw down the city without engines of war or other means, and in obedience to His word they went about its walls seven days. (Comp. Matt. 17. 20.)

31. Rahab—"though formerly one not of the fairest character"—WESLEY.

Rahab. (Josh. 2.) The term harlot is probably to be taken in its natural sense. That believed not—or, "obeyed not"; the inhabitants of Jericho, who, though the acts of God in behalf of Israel were not unknown to them (Josh. 2. 10), refused to submit to Him. "The harlot Rahab. So she is called in Josh. 2. 1; Jas. 2. 25, and it shows the faithfulness of the sacred narrative that her name is even introduced as well as that of Ruth, a Moabitess, in the genealogy of our Lord. (Matt. 1. 5.) The Targum softens it down into 'innkeeper,' and others render it 'idolatrous.' Her name was highly honoured by the Jews, who said that eight prophets—among them Baruch, Jeremiah, and Shallum — were descended from her, and the prophetess Huldah"—C. B.

32. "After Samuel, the prophets are properly mentioned. David also was a prophet; but he was a king too. The prophets—Elijah, Elisha, etc., including likewise the believers who lived with them"—WESLEY.

"The time would fail me. The phrase is also found in Philo, De Somniis. The names of 'the heroes of faith' here mentioned are drawn from the Books of Judges and Samuel, with a reference to the Books of Kings and Chronicles, and what is known of the history of the prophets. There does not seem to be any special design in the arrangement of the pairs of names, though it is a curious circumstance that, in each pair the hero who came earlier in time is placed after the other. In vers. 32–34 we have instances of active, and in 35–38 of passive faith"—C. B.

33, 34. "David in particular, subdued kingdoms. Samuel (not excluding the rest), wrought righteousness. The prophets, in general, obtained promises, both for themselves, and to deliver to others. Prophets also stopped the mouths of lions, as Daniel; and quenched the violence of fire, as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. To these examples, whence the nature of faith clearly appears, those more ancient ones are subjoined (by a transposition, and in an inverted order) which receive light from these. Jephthah escaped the edge of the sword; Samson out of weakness was made strong; Barak became valiant in fight; Gideon put to flight armies of the aliens. Faith animates to the most heroic enterprises, both civil and military. Faith overcomes all impediments; effects the greatest things; attains to the very best; and inverts, by its miraculous power, the very course of nature"—WESLEY.

Subdued kingdoms. "The allusion is specially to the conquest of Canaan by Joshua, and to the victories of David. (2 Sam. 5. 17–25; 21. 15, etc.). Wrought righteousness. The allusion is somewhat vague, but seems to refer to the justice of Judges and Kings (1 Sam. 12. 3, 4; 2 Sam. 8. 15; 1 Chron. 18. 14, etc.), and perhaps especially to the judgment of Solomon. 'To execute judgment and justice' belonged especially to the princes of Israel (Ezek. 45. 9). Obtained promises. If we compare the expression with vers. 13–39, we see that the primary reference must be to temporal promises (see Josh. 21. 43–45, etc.); but they also obtained at least a partial fruition of spiritual promises also. Stopped the mouths of lions. Samson (Judg. 14. 5, 6), David (1 Sam. 17. 34, 35), Daniel (Dan. 6. 22), Benaiah (2 Sam. 23. 20). Quenched the violence of fire. (Dan. 3. 25; 1 Macc. 2. 59.) Escaped the edge of the sword. David (1 Sam. 18. 11; 19. 10, etc.), Elijah (1 Kings 19. 2, 3), Elisha (2 Kings 6. 12–17; Jer. 26. 24, etc.)"—C. B.

35. Women—"naturally weak—received their dead—children. Others were tortured—from those who acted great things the apostle rises higher, to those who showed the power of faith by suffering. Not accepting deliverance—on sinful terms. That they might obtain a better resurrection—an higher reward, seeing the greater their sufferings the greater would be their glory"—WESLEY.

The writer places over against each other two kinds of manifestations of faith—the faith of those women (1 Kings 17. 17 seq.; 2 Kings 4. 17 seq.), whose sons were restored to bodily life by the prophets, and the still greater faith of the martyrs, who sacrificed the bodily life in faith, and on account of faith, for the sake of the future resurrection to the glorified life. Hence he does not merely say, "Not accepting deliverance that they might obtain a better deliverance," but referring back to the first clause of the verse, he speaks of a "better resurrection."

36. And others. "The apostle seems here to pass on to recent examples"—WESLEY.

Here the apostle enumerates other forms of suffering to which some of the ancient saints were subjected.

37. They were sawn asunder—"as, according to the tradition of the Jews, Isaiah was by Manasseh. Were tempted — torments and death are mentioned alternately. Every way; by threatenings, reproaches, tortures, the variety of which cannot be expressed; and again by promises and allurements"—WESLEY.

"Were stoned, as Zechariah. (2 Chron. 24. 20–22; Matt. 23. 35.) There is also a tradition that Jeremiah was stoned to death in Egypt. Stoning was a common mode of capital punishment among the Jews. (Deut. 13. 10; Josh. 7. 25, etc.; Matt. 21. 35; Acts 7. 57–60.) Were sawn asunder, as tradition asserts of Isaiah under Manasseh. This tradition is frequently referred to in ancient times by writers both Jewish and Christian. See also the Apocryphal ascension of the prophet Isaiah, English translation by Lawrence. (Comp. 2 Sam. 12. 31; 1 Chron. 20. 3.) Were tempted occasions difficulty, because it refers to mere trials in the midst of three very cruel modes of putting to death. In sound the term is very like the preceding word, and some suppose that it is a repetition by mistake of this word, and would strike it out. Others would slightly alter the spelling so as to produce the meaning, 'they were burnt.' The MS. authority is in favour of 'were tempted,' and the reference must be to cruel tortures practised on men to procure apostasy. Slain with the sword, as Urijah, the prophet. (Jer. 26. 23; comp. 1 Kings 19. 10.) In sheepskins. (Comp. perhaps 2 Kings 1. 8)"—DAVIDSON.

38. Of whom the world was not worthy—"it did not deserve so great a blessing. They wandered — being driven out from men"—WESLEY.

The world despised them, and thought them not worthy of its regards or society; but the reverse was the truth; the world was not worthy of them, and therefore God withdrew them from it. The world, in persecuting and driving them into the desert, witnessed against and punished itself. DELITZSCH adds: "The author breaks off here his rapid summary of Old Testament history, which might be styled pre-eminently a history of faith, to take one last review of the whole."

39. And all these—"though they obtained a good testimony (ver. 2), yet did not receive the great promise, the heavenly inheritance"—WESLEY.

Having obtained a good report. "Now that the history is concluded the word of ver. 2 is resumed. That in such a faith as was described in ver. 1 'the elders' received their witness from God, the records themselves have shown; yet these all having had witness borne to them through their faith received not the promise—i.e. the promised blessing. There are three passages of the Epistle which must be kept together—Ch. 6. 15, 'And so having patiently waited, he (Abraham) obtained the promise'; Ch. 10. 36, 'Ye have need of endurance, that, having done the will of God, ye may receive the promise'; and the present verse"—MOULTON.

40. God having provided some better thing for us—"namely, everlasting glory—that they might not be perfected without us—that is, that we might all be perfected together in heaven"—WESLEY.

"For them final salvation was simply a future good; for us it is at once present and future; present, in that the whole blessing has been procured for us by the self-sacrifice of Christ once for all; future, in that the full development and apprehension of this blessing is not yet realised. (Comp. ch. 9. 28 with 10. 14)"—DELITZSCH.

CHAPTER XII.

IN this chapter the writer takes up again the exhortation of ch. 10. 19–39, pointing to the example of Jesus, encouraging those who are in trial, warning against sin, and especially the sin of rejecting Him who speaks to us from heaven.

1. Wherefore, being encompassed with a cloud—"a great multitude, tending upward with a holy swiftness—of witnesses—of the power of faith—let us lay aside every weight—as all who run a race take care to do. Let us throw off whatever weighs us down, or damps the vigour of our soul. And the sin which easily besetteth us—as doth the sin of our constitution, the sin of our education, the sin of our profession"—WESLEY.

Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about—"rather, 'Therefore, let us also—since we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses—having put away all encumbrance and the sin . . . run with patient endurance the race that is set before us, looking,' etc. ('In so difficult a verse as this we need an exactness of translation which might otherwise not be desirable.') It is plain that the chief thought is, 'Let us run our race with patient endurance, looking unto Jesus the Author . . . of our faith'; so that here again we have the thought which the writer is never weary of enforcing, the need of faith and patience for all who would inherit the promises. The connection is chiefly with the last verses of ch. 11, which are, indeed, a summary of the whole chapter. The purpose of God has been that those who throughout the past ages obtained witness of Him through their faith should not reach their consummation apart from us. To that consummation, then, let us press forward, Present to us in the view of Christ's accomplished sacrifice, it is all future in regard of personal attainment. As those who have preceded us reached the goal, each one for himself, by faith and patient endurance, so must we. The thought of persevering effort crowned by a recompense of regard (ch. 6. 12, 18; 10. 35-39) very naturally suggested the imagery of the public games (by this time familiar even to Jews), to which S. Paul in his Epistles so frequently alludes. (See 1 Cor. 4. 9; 9. 24-27; Phil. 3. 12-14; 1 Tim. 6. 12; 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8; comp. ch. 10. 32, 33)"—MOULTON.

2. Looking—"from all other things — to Jesus—as the wounded Israelites to the brazen serpent. Our crucified Lord was prefigured by the lifting up of this; our guilt, by the stings of the fiery serpents; and our faith, by their looking up to the miraculous remedy. The author and finisher of our faith—who begins it in us, carries it on, and perfects it. Who for the joy that was set before Him—patiently and willingly endured the cross, with all the pains annexed thereto. And is set down—where there is fulness of joy"—WESLEY.

"The author has exhorted his Hebrew readers to run the course of Christian duty set before them with steadfast endurance, as under the eyes of so many invisible witnesses that have accomplished the like course in days gone by, and, in order to do this, to cast off manfully every encumbrance, and break through the trammels and hindrances of sin. He now proceeds, in the second part of his admonition, to commend to them as the main condition of all success, as the chief source of inspiration for the true athlete temper, and as the mightiest stimulant to steadfastness of faith, an upward glance to Jesus and His glorious example—looking up to faith's Captain and Completer, Jesus"—DELITZSCH.

3. Consider—"draw the comparison and think. The Lord bore all this; and shall His servants bear nothing? Him that endured such contradiction from sinners—such enmity and opposition of every kind. Lest ye be weary—dull and languid, and so actually faint in your course"—WESLEY.

That ye wax not weary, fainting in your souls (R.V.). "The figure of the race is still continued, 'For unless ye thus look unto Jesus ye will grow weary.' Consider—lit. 'compare'; place your sufferings by the side of His. Contradiction (R.V. 'Gainsaying of sinners against themselves'). The sin or the opposition manifested against Him was really against themselves, since it was for their salvation that He came upon earth. To all His other sorrows were added the pain of their ingratitude and His grief over their aggravated guilt"—MOULTON.

4. Unto blood—"unto wounds and death"—WESLEY.

"Unlike Him who endureth a cross, their resistance to sin has not yet gone the length of bloodshed. Ye have not yet . . . blood. Many think that the author passes here from the figure of the race to that of the pugilistic arena, and says that in their encounter with sin no blood has yet flowed, meaning that the struggle has not hitherto been very severe. Even if such a figure be supposed, there must lie under the figure the meaning that the persecutions to which the Hebrews had been subjected had not yet resulted in martyrdom. Striving against sin—i.e. in their strife against sin. 'Sin' is not here put for sinners, nor is it sin in their persecutors; it is sin in themselves, the sin of unbelief, which is here regarded as their true antagonist, though of course the excesses of their persecutors gave it its power against them"—DAVIDSON.

5. "And yet ye seem already to have forgotten the exhortation—wherein God speaketh to you with the utmost tenderness. Despise not thou the chastening of the Lord—do not slight or make little of it; do not impute any affliction to chance or second causes; but see and revere the hand of God in it. Neither faint when thou art rebuked of Him—but endure it patiently and fruitfully"—WESLEY.

"The expression is not merely figurative; that they have not yet resisted sin (without and within) to the utmost of their power. Their Christian profession has not yet cost them their lives. They are refusing or fleeing from the cross, and seem quite to have forgotten that the afflictions which God sends to His people are a discipline of love"—DELITZSCH.

6. For—"all springs from love; therefore neither despise nor faint"—WESLEY.

"Here is the reason why we should neither neglect correction, nor faint under it: it is a proof of the fatherly love of God, and shows His most gracious designs toward us, from which we may be convinced that the affliction will prove the means of good to our souls, if we make a proper use of it"—CLARKE.

7. Whom his father chasteneth not—"when he offends"—WESLEY.

As usual with the scripture which he quotes, the author first seizes the idea of the quotation, and then founds his exhortation upon it. He exhibits the idea in vers. 7, 8, "Ye are sons, your afflictions are chastisement, the chastening is evidence of your true sonship." Then follows, in vers. 9, 10, the exhortation to exhibit the right bearing of children under the discipline of God.

8. "Of which all sons are partakers—more or less"—WESLEY.

He speaks of God's blessed and disciplinary chastisement as a gift in which all His sons have their share.

9. And we reverenced them—"we neither despised nor fainted under their correction. Shall we not much rather—submit with reverence and meekness. To the Father of spirits—that we may live with Him for ever. Perhaps these expressions, 'fathers of our flesh' and 'Father of spirits,' intimate that our earthly fathers are only the parents of our bodies, our souls not being originally derived from them, but all created by the immediate power of God; perhaps, at the beginning of the world"—WESLEY.

"Unto the Father of spirits—God might be called 'the Father of the spirits,' as having created angels and spirits; but more probably the meaning is 'the Father of our spirits,' as in Num. 16. 22, 'the God of the spirits of all flesh.' God made our bodies and our souls, but our spirits are in a yet closer relation to Him. (Job 12. 10; Eccles. 12. 7; Zech. 12. 1; Isa. 42. 5, etc.) If it meant 'the author of spiritual gifts,' the expression would be far-fetched, and would be no contrast to 'the father of our flesh'"—C. B.

10. For they verily for a few days—"how few are even all our days on earth! Chastened us as they thought good—though frequently they erred therein, by too much either of indulgence or severity. But He always, unquestionably, for our profit, that we may be partakers of His holiness—that is, of Himself and His glorious image"—WESLEY.

"For a few days . . . their own pleasure. The chastisement of natural parents is after their own pleasure, or as seems good to them. Even when most conscientious and affectionate and wise, there may be an element of passion, and certainly of misjudgment, in it; for what parent can perfectly estimate the offence and the circumstances, or, above all, with true insight gauge the temper and the nature of the child he chastens? Further, the chastening of natural parents is but for a few days; our relations to them are such that as life advances it ceases. Yet though our subjection to them is only for a time, by the very law of life and though their chastening may often be capricious and always marked by error of excess or defect, or misdirection, we gave them reverence. But He for our profit . . . holiness. Unlike that of earthly parents, the chastening of the Father of our spirits is without fail for our profit, in His infinite wisdom and skill as framer of the spirit, and love as Father. The words, that we might be partakers of His holiness, explain 'for our profit'; this is the profit He intends and which He brings about. 'Holiness' or sanctity in God is properly separation or distance from the world and elevation above it: holiness in men is separation from the world and dedication unto God. In both cases the word expresses in the first instance a relation. God's design in chastening men is to remove them more and more from community with the world, and make them more dedicated unto Himself, and like Him. What the author means to bring out by saying that the chastisement of earthly parents is for a few days, is the brevity and comparative unimportance of our connection with our natural parents; their chastisement is for a short time as the duration of our relation to them is short, and indeed their chastisement, if wise, has in view to make us able to be independent of them. God's chastening has another view, to make us partakers of His holiness, to unite us to Him in character and likeness more and more. It is not the duration of the chastisement that is the point of the passage; it is the duration of our relation in each case to Him who chastens"—DAVIDSON.

"God delights not in the rod, judgment is His strange work"—CLARKE.

11. Now all chastening—"whether from our earthly or heavenly Father—is for the present grievous, yet it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness—holiness and happiness—to them that are exercised thereby—that receive this exercise as from God, and improve it according to His will"—WESLEY.

Now no chastening, etc. — "better (the reading being slightly changed), 'All chastening seemeth for the present time to be not joyous, but grievous.' The language, so far, would seem to be perfectly general, relating to all chastening, whether human or Divine. The following clause may seem to confine our thought to the latter; but, with a lower sense of 'righteousness,' the maxim is true of the wise discipline of earthly parents. The peaceable fruit of righteousness—better, 'peaceful fruit, (fruit) of righteousness,' to them that have been trained thereby.' The 'peaceful' fruit stands in contrast with the unrest and trouble which have preceded during the time of 'chastening.' But there is more than rest after conflict, for the object of the conflict is attained; the fruit consists in righteousness. (Comp. Isa. 32. 17; Prov. 11. 30; Jas. 3. 17; Phil. 1. 11.) It has been sometimes supposed that in the word 'trained' the writer returns to the figure of ver. 4; but this is not probable"—MOULTON.

12. Wherefore lift up the hands—"whether your own or your brethren's—that hang down—unable to continue the combat—and the feeble knees—unable to continue the race"—WESLEY.

"The apostle refers to Isa. 35. 3. The words are an address to persons almost worn out with sickness and fatigue, whose hands hang down, whose knees shake, and who are totally discouraged. These are exhorted to exert themselves, and take courage, with the assurance that they shall infallibly conquer if they persevere"—CLARKE.

13. And make straight paths both for your own and for their feet—remove every hindrance, every offence—that the lame—they who are weak, scarce able to walk—be not turned out of the way—of faith and holiness"—WESLEY.

Turned out of the way . . . healed. If the path taken and made by the community was straight and even, those members who were lame might the more easily follow it, and by use their lameness (which had probably arisen from the inequalities of the way) would disappear and be healed. The words "turned out of the way" mean in medical writers "dislocated," and this gives a more vigorous sense and forms a better opposition to "be healed." Inconsistency and vacillation in the general body of the Church would create a way so difficult for the lame, that their lameness would become dislocation, and they would perish from the way; on the other hand, the habit of going in a plain path would restore them to soundness.

14. Follow peace with all men — "this second branch of the exhortation concerns our neighbours; the third, God. And holiness—the not following after all holiness is the direct way to fall into sin of every kind"—WESLEY.

"Individual believers are exhorted to cherish peaceful relations with all members of the community, even with the lame, the sickly, and weak. The improvement of such is to be aimed at, not by carnal contention, harsh acts of judgments, or uncharitable avoidance of their society, nor yet by merely setting them a good example in the purity and decision of our own conduct, while coldly waiting for the first advance on their side towards mutual explanation or agreement; but on our own part, by earnest, active endeavours after a good understanding, a pursuing or hunting after peace as a noble prey or object of search, the Church must endeavour all she can to reproduce in herself the image of that Divine calm in particular, and of the Divine holiness in general, which is itself the absolute unclouded light, and the absolute all-embracing, all-reconciling love"—DELITZSCH.

15. Looking diligently, lest anyone—"if he do not lift up the hands that hang down—fall from the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness—of envy, anger, suspicion—springing up—destroy the sweet peace; lest any, not following after holiness, fall into fornication or profaneness. In general, any corruption, either in doctrine or practice, is a 'root of bitterness,' and may pollute many"—WESLEY.

"Lest any man fail of the grace of God—lit. 'whether there be any man who is falling short of,' or possibly 'falling back from the grace of God.' It is not improbable that the writer has in view some one individual instance of a tendency towards apostasy, which might have a fatal influence upon other weary or wavering brethren. (Comp. ch. 3. 12.) Lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you. The words 'root of bitterness' are a reference to Deut. 29. 18, 'a root that beareth gall and wormwood,' or, as in the margin, 'a poisonful herb'"—C. B. "Lest any man fail—rather, 'whether anyone be falling back from the grace of God.' The defection of one member of the community brings loss and danger to the whole body. The last words of ch. 10. 26 will show what is implied in this 'falling back from the grace of God'"—MOULTON.

16. Esau "was profane for so slighting the blessing which went along with the birthright"—WESLEY.

"Esau is here mentioned as a type of the profane, who care not for Divine things, but only for the gains and pleasures of this world. Who for one morsel of meat—better, 'who for one meal sold his own birthright' (Gen. 25. 29–34). We cannot suppose that the writer has in thought the material rights of the firstborn, such as his claim on pre-eminence, and, possibly (see Deut. 21. 17), on a larger share of his father's possessions. Tradition relates that, up to the time of Aaron, priestly functions were discharged by each firstborn son (comp. Num. 3. 5–13); and to the line of the firstborn would seem to belong that 'blessing of Abraham' (Gen. 28. 4), which everyone who shared Abraham's faith would earnestly desire to possess"—MOULTON. "The Lord's Church must be on her guard, lest any bitter root springing up in the spiritual garden disturb her sacred peace, and lest any faithless member, by indulging lusts of the flesh, have forfeited his own salvation, and so become like Esau, who was so profane, so low-minded, so utterly lost to a sense of higher things, that for one poor dish he gave up or sold the rights of the firstborn to a double portion of the inheritance of his father (Deut. 21. 17), and what to the mind of faith was the most precious privilege of all—the continuation of that patriarchal line in which were enshrined the promises"—DELITZSCH.

17. He was rejected—"he could not obtain it—for [he found no place for repentance—there was no room for any such repentance as would regain what he had lost. Though he sought it—the blessing of the 'birthright'—diligently with tears. He sought too late. Let us use the present time"—WESLEY.

For ye know how that afterward, etc.—"The meaning of the verse will be seen more clearly if one clause be placed in a parenthesis, 'For ye know that even when he afterwards desired to inherit the blessing he was rejected (for he found no place of repentance), though he sought it earnestly with tears.' The blessing of Jacob related in Gen. 27 is here viewed (apart from all attendant circumstances) as a necessary consequence of Esau's 'profane' scorn of his birthright. Notwithstanding Esau's piteous entreaty, Isaac cannot but ratify (Gen. 27. 33) the blessing which he has pronounced; though his son sought the blessing earnestly with tears (Gen. 27. 38), he was rejected. He found no place of repentance: the first act (Gen. 25. 33) could not be recalled, but brought with it a loss which nothing could retrieve"—MOULTON.

18. For—"a strong reason this why they ought the more to regard the whole exhortation drawn from the priesthood of Christ; because both salvation and vengeance are now nearer at hand—ye are not come to the mountain that could be touched—that was of an earthy, material nature"—WESLEY.

"For ye are not come. At the close of his argument and exhortation the writer condenses the results of his Epistle into a climax of magnificent eloquence and force, in which he shows the transcendent beauty and supremacy of the new covenant as compared with the terrors and imperfections of the old. Unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire. Unless we allow the textual evidence to be overruled by the other considerations, which are technically called 'paradiplomatic evidence,' the verse should be rendered 'For ye have not come near to a palpable and enkindled fire.' In any case the allusion is to Ex. 19. 16–19; Deut. 4. 11, and generally to 'the fiery law.' Blackness and darkness, and tempest. (Deut 4. 11; 5. 22)"—C. B.

19. The sound of a trumpet—"formed, without doubt, by the ministry of angels, and preparatory to the words, that is, the ten commandments, which were uttered with a loud voice (Deut. 5. 22)"—WESLEY.

(See Ex. 19. 19, "the voice of the trumpet," Deut. 4. 12, "the voice of the words.")

Intreated. "'If we hear the voice of the Lord our God any more, then we shall die.' (Deut. 5. 25; Ex. 20. 19.) Though God drew near to Israel, to reveal Himself, so terrible was His voice to them, so awful the penalties which fenced round their approach to Him, that they shrank back from hearing His words"—MOULTON.

20. For they could not bear—"the terror which seized them, when they heard those words proclaimed. If even a beast. etc."—WESLEY.

It was not so much the thing commanded, as the manner in which it uttered itself, that Israel shrank from. The ordinance that even a beast approaching the mount was to be stoned, as guilty of an act of sacrilege, made the whole prohibition, which was principally aimed at human presumption (Ex. 19. 12), the more terrible, and is, therefore, the only point mentioned here.

21. "Even Moses—though admitted to so near an intercourse with God, who 'spake to him as a man speaketh to his friend.' At other times he acted as a mediator between God and the people. But while the ten words were pronounced, he stood as one of the hearers. (Ex. 19. 25; 20. 19)"—WESLEY.

Moses is nowhere represented in the Old Testament as uttering these precise words; though comp. Deut. 9. 19. Possibly the author was in possession of other traditions. On the giving of the Law, see Ex., chaps. 19 and 20.

22. But ye—"who believe in Christ—are come—the apostle does not here speak of their coming to the Church militant, but of that glorious privilege of New Testament believers, their communion with the Church triumphant. But this is far more apparent to the eyes of celestial spirits than to ours, which are yet veiled. S. Paul here shows an excellent knowledge of the heavenly economy, worthy of him who had been caught up into the third heaven. To Mount Sion—a spiritual mountain. To the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem—all these glorious titles belong to the New Testament Church—and to an innumerable company—including all that are afterwards mentioned"—WESLEY.

"Unto Mount Sion. The true Sion is the antitype of all the promises with which the name had been connected. (Ps. 2. 6; 48. 2; 78. 68; 125. 1; Joel 2. 32; Micah 4. 7.) Hence the names of Sion and the heavenly Jerusalem are given to the city of the living God. (Gal. 4. 26; Rev. 21. 2.) Sinai and Mount Sion are contrasted with each other in six particulars. To an innumerable company of angels. This punctuation is suggested by the word 'myriads,' which is often applied to angels. (Deut. 33. 2; Ps. 68. 17; Dan. 7. 10.) But under the new covenant the angels are surrounded with attributes, not of terror, but of beauty and goodness. (Ch. 1. 14; Rev. 5. 11, 12)"—C. B.

33. To the general assembly—"the word properly signifies a stated convention on some festival occasion—and Church—the whole body of true believers, whether on earth or in paradise—of the firstborn—'the firstborn' of Israel were enrolled by Moses; but these are enrolled in heaven, as citizens there. It is observable, that in this beautiful gradation, these firstborn are placed nearer to God than the angels. (See Jas. 1. 18.) And to God the Judge of all—propitious to you—adverse to your enemies. And to the spirits—the separate souls—of just men—it seems to mean, of New Testament believers. The number of these, being not yet large, is mentioned distinct from the innumerable company of just men whom their judge hath acquitted. These are now made perfect in a higher sense than any who are still alive. Accordingly, S. Paul, while yet on earth, denies that he was thus 'made perfect' (Phil. 3. 12)."

And to God the Judge of all. "The order of the Greek seems to require the rendering, 'and to a Judge (who is) God of all.' Up to this point our thought has rested on the heavenly world and those who from the time of their creation have been its inhabitants. Men who have passed through this earthly life have no essential right to citizenship in the 'heavenly Jerusalem.' They come before a Judge. (Comp. ch. 9. 27.) 'The Lord shall judge His people' (ch. 10. 30), severing between His servants and His foes (Mal. 3. 18; 4. 1), condemning the wicked, and receiving the righteous to His own dwelling-place. This Judge is 'God of all'—of angels and of righteous souls (Wisdom 3. 1), and of Christian men who 'draw nigh' to the celestial city. How characteristic of the writer and his theme is the introduction of these solemn words into the midst of this description of Christian privilege and blessing. And to the spirits of just men made perfect. The last verses of ch. 11 are at once called before the mind by these words. The 'righteous' men have 'by faith' run their course (chaps. 10. 38; 11. 4. 7; Phil. 3. 12); they have obtained the promises (chaps. 6. 15; 11. 1). The analogy of Scripture forbids us to consider their present state as the full consummation; for that these 'spirits,' and we who are yet 'in the body,' await the day of the resurrection. What was received by those 'spirits of the righteous' when they saw the day of Christ, we cannot tell; but the teaching of Scripture seems to be that they were raised to some higher state of blessedness. These are the new inhabitants of the world above; they have come into the presence of God by means of the blood of sprinkling, through Jesus"—MOULTON.

24. To Jesus, the Mediator—"through whom they had been perfected. And to the blood of sprinkling—to all the virtue of His precious blood shed for you, whereby ye are sprinkled from an evil conscience. This blood of sprinkling was the foundation of our Lord's mediatorial office. Here the gradation is at the highest point. Which speaketh better things than that of Abel—which cried for vengeance"—WESLEY.

Rather, "And to the Mediator of a new covenant, Jesus. The covenant is called 'new' as of recent formation, and also as of ever fresh and vigorous youth, in contrast to the old, which was now antiquated and about to disappear. The Mediator of this covenant is called 'Jesus.' The sacred writer loves that name, and by it designates the Lord both as the Perfected One (ch. 2. 9, 10) and the Perfecter (ch. 12. 2), and again (ch. 7. 22) as the Surety of the better covenant. The name 'Jesus' is in itself more significant than that of 'Christ,' containing as it does the Divine name Jehovah, and designating the Divine work accomplished by the incarnate Son as the work of salvation. The writer, therefore, expressly calls the Mediator of the new covenant to which we belong by this His saving name, and lays especial emphasis upon it, as the highest pledge of the grace and glory of the covenant at the head of which He stands"—DELITZSCH.

25. Refuse not—"by unbelief—Him that speaketh—and whose speaking even now is a prelude to the final scene. The same voice which spake both by the Law and in the gospel, when heard from heaven, will shake heaven and earth. For if they escaped not—His vengeance—much more shall not we—those of us who turn from Him that speaketh from heaven—that is, who came from heaven to speak to us"—WESLEY.

"Abel's blood cries for vengeance; Christ's blood cries for grace. With this is connected the exhortation not to refuse this Jesus who, by His blood, cries for grace for us. When the Israelites at Sinai (ver. 19) refused to hear God's voice, and to fulfil His commands, they were punished. He, moreover, who refuses to hear the voice of grace is lost. It is Christ, who in heaven cries for grace to us, and thus offers us grace from heaven"—EBRARD.

26. Whose voice then shook the earth—"when He spoke from Mount Sinai. But now—with regard to His next speaking—He hath promised—it is a joyful promise to the saints, though dreadful to the wicked—yet once more I will shake, not only the earth, but also the heaven. These words may refer in a lower sense to the dissolution of the Jewish Church and state; but in their full sense they undoubtedly look much further, even to the end of all things. This universal shaking began at the first coming of Christ. It will be consummated at His second coming"—WESLEY.

"This warning is made more impressive by reference to the accompaniments of the Divine speaking in the two revelations respectively. A shaking accompanied God's speaking from Sinai; but it was only of the earth; and it was temporary, and subsided, leaving the frame of things as it was; a shaking shall follow God's speaking from heaven, more pervasive and with more imposing effects; this shaking shall grasp both heaven and earth, and amidst it the things that are made and of this material creation, and which can be shaken, shall pass away, leaving behind the world of true essential existence that cannot be shaken, the inheritance of the saints (ver. 28). The author finds an emphasis to lie in the words yet once more, or 'yet once,' of the prophecy (Hagg. 2. 6), implying the finality of the shaking, and the removing through it of the sensible material world, the things that are made. And this removing is in order to the manifesting and the abiding of the true ideal world which cannot be shaken but remains and becomes the heritage of men redeemed. (Ch. 2. 5, etc.)"—DAVIDSON.

27. The things which are shaken—"namely, heaven and earth. As being made—and consequently liable to change. That the things which are not shaken may remain—even 'the new heavens and the new earth' (Rev. 21. 1)"—WESLEY.

"When God yet once more shakes not the earth only, but also heaven,—yet once more, and consequently not again, so that this shaking, as a conclusive event, makes a separation between the things which can, and the things which cannot, be shaken,—this will be the final change of the world, the unavoidable, certain, and now impending change of the variable into the invariable, which was aimed at in the creation"—HOFMANN.

28. Therefore let us, receiving—"by willing and joyful faith — a kingdom — more glorious than the present heaven and earth— hold fast the grace, whereby we may serve God—in every thought, word, and work. With reverence—lit. 'with shame'—arising from a deep consciousness of our own unworthiness—and godly fear—a tender, jealous fear of offending, arising from a sense of the gracious majesty of God"—WESLEY.

"When amidst this shaking the material creation passes away, there remains the kingdom that cannot be shaken, the world to come, the destined heritage of men (ch. 2. 5; Dan. 7. 18); and that this inheritance may be ours, let us have grace (comp. ver. 15). So another apostle says: 'Let us have peace with God' (Rom. 5. 1); and yet another: 'Give diligence to make your calling and election sure (2 Pet. 1. 10), that is, not to make yourselves assured of it, but to make it secure and stable (Heb. 2. 2, 3) in itself. Serve God with reverence and godly fear, or, 'with godly fear' (ch. 5. 7) 'and awe.' (Comp. ch. 9. 14)"—DAVIDSON.

29. For our God is a consuming fire—"in the strictness of His justice, and purity of His holiness"—WESLEY.

For our God is a consuming fire. "The reference is to Deut. 4. 24, and the special application of the description to one set of circumstances shows that this is not — like 'God is light' and 'God is love'—a description of the whole character of God, but an anthropomorphic way of expressing His hatred of apostasy and idolatry. Here the reference is made to show why we ought to serve God with holy reverence and fear"—C. B.

CHAPTER XIII.

THIS concluding chapter is chiefly occupied with special exhortations relating to Christian conduct; with these, however, are intermingled some important and characteristic references to the leading themes of the Epistle.

1. "Brotherly love is explained in the following verses"—WESLEY.

Let the love of the brethren continue (R.V.). (See Rom. 12. 10; 1 Thess. 4. 9; 1 Pet. 1. 22.) "The love as when you first believed, and when many of you sold your possessions to raise a fund for the widows who were cut off from the alms of the synagogue"—SUTCLIFFE. "Love is the fountain and foundation of all moral and religious duties which Christians owe to each other and to all men, and therefore it is here placed at the head of them all"—BENSON.

2. Some—"Abraham and Lot—have entertained angels unawares—so may an unknown guest, even now, be of more worth than he appears, and may have angels attending him, though unseen"—WESLEY.

Forget not to show love unto strangers (R.V.) "Hospitality to Christian brethren at a distance from their homes is specially intended (1 Pet. 4. 9); this was one manifestation of the 'love of the brethren' (ver. 1). The prominence assigned to this duty in the exhortations of the Epistles of the New Testament was faithfully reflected in the practice of the early Church"—MOULTON. To kindness to strangers. "'The 'strangers' referred to are Christian brethren from other places. To these, whether pursuing the means of living or perhaps fleeing from hardships falling on them in their own homes, the Hebrews are to extend hospitality. This was a sacred duty. It was also a privilege, for such guests brought many times more than they received. Angels unawares. (Comp. Gen. chaps. 18. and 19.) The angels are the immediate ministers of God and His providence. Through such hospitality men sometimes brought themselves into currents of thought and life new to them, currents flowing directly from God Himself"—DAVIDSON.

3. Remember—"in your prayers, and by your help—them that are in bonds, as being bound with them—seeing ye are members one of another. And them that suffer as being yourselves in the body—and consequently liable to the same"—WESLEY.

"As bound with them, i.e. probably, 'as if bound with them'; have the same feeling for them as if ye shared their bonds. Or, the meaning may be that being all members of one body they did share their bonds, and the exhortation may be one to call this to remembrance and act in the spirit of this profound idea. (1 Cor. 12. 25.) Also in the body, i.e. as men still living on the earth in the body, and liable to the same sufferings as they endure"—DAVIDSON.

4. "Marriage is honourable in, or for all sorts of men, clergy as well as laity: though the Romanists teach otherwise. And the bed undefiled—consistent with the highest purity. But whoremongers and adulterers God will judge—though they frequently escape the sentence of men"—WESLEY.

Let marriage be had in honour among all (R.V.). "This affirmation of the apostle is intended to counteract the pernicious notion of some ascetics, who at this early period denounced marriage as incompatible with the pure spirit of Christianity"—SUTCLIFFE. The author desires to lift up marriage to its true place and give men true views of it as a fundamental relation in society and the law of God. From the connection, in all seems rather to mean "among all," than, in all respects. (Comp. 1 Thess. 4. 6.)

5. "He—God—hath said—to all believers, in saying it to Jacob, Joshua, and Solomon"—WESLEY.

Be ye free from the love of money (R.V.). Your conversation—lit. "manner" (of mind), i.e. turn or disposition. For He hath said, i.e.

God. The exact words quoted are not found in the Old Testament, but see Deut. 31. 6.

7. Remember them—"who are now with God, considering the happy end of their conversation on earth"—WESLEY.

And considering the issue of their life, imitate their faith (R.V.). Imitate their faith—"their Christian life and course (James 3. 13; 1 Pet. 1. 15), had been known by the Church; they, too, have obtained a good report 'by faith' (ch. 11. 2), and all who contemplate the blessed issue of such a life will be strengthened to imitate their faith"—MOULTON. "Though all your intercourse with them is for the present cut off, do not forget their instructions and examples"—BENSON.

8. "Men may die; but Jesus Christ, yea, and His gospel, is the same from everlasting to everlasting"—WESLEY.

Jesus Christ the same—"rather, 'Jesus Christ is yesterday and to-day the same; yea, also for ever.' Their earlier guides have passed away (ver. 7); their Lord and Saviour abides the same for ever. He who is the subject of all Christian teaching is the same, therefore (ver. 9) be not 'carried away by divers teachings.' Thus, this verse stands connected both with what precedes and with what follows. 'Yesterday' carries the thought back to the lifetime of the teachers now no more; what the Saviour was to them, that will He be to their survivors. The whole period since He 'sat down on the right hand of God' (ch. 10. 12, 13) is covered by this word. What He was 'yesterday and to-day' He will be for ever. (See ch. 1. 11, 12.)"—MOULTON. "From everlasting to everlasting; the same in His person and offices, in His love and power, in His truth and grace; the same object of faith; and the same in all respects, to all believers, in all ages"—BENSON.

9. Be not carried about with various doctrines—"which differ from that one faith in our one unchangeable Lord. Strange—to the ears and hearts of all that abide in Him. For it is good—it is both honourable before God, and pleasant and profitable—that the heart be stablished with grace—springing from faith in Christ—not with meats—Jewish ceremonies, which indeed can never stablish the heart"—WESLEY.

With grace not with meats—"better, 'by grace; not by meats.' Instead of being 'carried away by strange teachings' let your hearts be made firm and sure by grace. As the whole system of ceremonial observance is alluded to under the one term 'meats,' so the blessings of the faith are comprised under 'grace,' a word used throughout this Epistle with peculiar significance. (See especially chaps. 10. 29; 12. 15, 28.) One human system of teaching will but lead on to another; grace will keep the heart firm in its loyal love to Jesus Christ, who is ever 'the same' (ver. 8). Which have not profited—lit. 'in which they that walked were not profited.' To the English reader the mode of expression must appear peculiar; in the Greek, however, there is little or no incongruity, for the word which we render 'walk' is used most freely to denote a course or manner of life. Comp. Eph. 2. 10, 'unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them.' Here the meaning is, that those who have made these external observances the rule of their life have failed of the profit which they sought. (Comp. ch. 7. 18, 19)"—MOULTON.

10. "On the former part of this verse, the fifteenth and sixteenth depend; on the latter, the intermediate verses. We have an altar—the cross of Christ—whereof they have no right to eat—to partake of the benefits which we receive therefrom. Who serve the tabernacle—who adhere to the Mosaic Law"—WESLEY.

"The altar is here put for the sacrifice on the altar; the Christian altar is the Christian sacrifice, which is Christ Jesus, with all the benefits of His passion and death. To these privileges they had no right who continued to offer the Levitical sacrifices, and to trust in them for remission of sins"—CLARKE.

11. "For—according to their own Law, the sin-offerings were wholly consumed, and no Jew ever ate thereof. But Christ was a sin-offering. Therefore they cannot feed upon Him, as we do, who are freed from the Mosaic Law"—WESLEY.

Are burnt without the camp. "Of the sin-offerings the priests could not, as in the case of other offerings, eat the entire flesh, or the breast and shoulder, or all except the fat. (Num. 6. 20; Lev. 6. 26. etc.) The word for 'burn' (saraph) means 'entirely to get rid of and is not the word used for burning upon the altar. The rule that these sin-offerings should be burned, not eaten, was stringent. (Lev. 6. 30; 16. 27)"—C. B.

12. Wherefore Jesus also—"exactly answering those typical sin-offerings—suffered without the gate—of Jerusalem, which answered to the old camp of Israel—that He might sanctify—reconcile and consecrate to God—the people—who believe in Him—by His own blood—not those shadowy sacrifices, which are now of no further use"—WESLEY.

"That He might sanctify the people with His own blood—lit. 'through' or 'by means of His own blood.' The thought is the same as that of Tit. 2. 14, 'Who gave Himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people.' This sanctification or purifying consecration of His people by the blood of His own voluntary sacrifice, corresponds to the sprinkling of the atoning blood on the Propitiatory by the high priest. (For 'the people,' see ch. 2. 16)"—C. B.

13. Let us then go forth without the camp—"out of the Jewish dispensation—bearing His reproach—all manner of shame, obloquy, and contempt for His sake"—WESLEY.

"The suffering without the gate was a symbol of His rejection by the Jews. All who would be His must share the reproach which came upon Him, who was cast out by His people and crucified (ch. 11. 26); they also must go forth 'without the camp,' forsaking the company of His foes. Each one must for himself make choice either of the synagogue or of the Church of Christ; between the two there can be no fellowship"—MOULTON.

14. For we have here—"on earth—no continuing city—all things here are but for a moment; and Jerusalem itself was just then on the point of being destroyed"—WESLEY.

"In this verse there seems to be a union of two thoughts—(1) We are free to go forth from the city so long held sacred, for our hopes are bound up with no abiding earthly sanctuary; (2) we may not shrink from the approach of Christ, because it will sever us from kindred and friends; for by the very profession of our faith we are 'strangers and sojourners' (ch. 11. 13), seeking after the heavenly Jerusalem (chaps. 11. 10; 12. 22). How impressive are these words when read in the light of the events then unlooked for, yet so near at hand, issuing in the destruction of both Temple and city. We seek one to come—rather, 'we seek after that (city) which is to come'"—MOULTON.

15. The sacrifice—"the altar is mentioned (ver. 10); now the sacrifices—(1) praise; (2) beneficence; with both of which God is well pleased"—WESLEY.

By Him—"better, 'through Him,' through His sacrifice, which has made atonement, we are hallowed (ver. 12), and fitted for our priestly service (1 Pet. 2. 5). Let us offer the sacrifice—rather, 'let us offer up a sacrifice of praise continually unto God, that is, fruit of lips making confession to His name.' The sacrifice we may bring is that symbolised by the thank-offering of Lev. 7. 12, where the same word is used. (See Ps. 50. 14, 23.) 'We will render the fruit of our lips' is the Greek version of Hos. 14. 2; the Hebrew text (as we have it) differs in expression but not in meaning, 'We will render our lips as bullocks,' i.e. as sacrifices. (Comp. Ps. 119. 108; Isa. 57. 19.) The fruit is borne by lips which offer thankful acknowledgment to the name of God. (Ps. 113. 1)"—MOULTON.

16. But to do good and to communicate forget not—"a most important and influential principle, to be found in no mere system of ethics, is also contained in the revelation of a particular relation in which we all stand to God, and on which we must be judged at the last day. We are stewards, servants, to whom the great Master has committed His goods, to be used according to His directions. We have nothing, therefore, of our own; no right in property, except under the conditions on which it is committed to us; and we must give an account for our use of it according to the rule"—WATSON.

17. Obey them that have the rule over you. "The word implies also, that lead or guide you—namely, in truth and holiness. And submit yourselves—give up (not your conscience or judgment, but) your own will in all things purely indifferent. For they watch over your souls—with all zeal and diligence, they guard and caution you against all danger, —as they that must give account—to the great Shepherd, for every part of their behaviour toward you. How vigilant then ought every pastor to be! How careful of every soul committed to his charge! That they may do this—watch over you. With joy and not with groans. He is not a good shepherd who does not either rejoice over them, or groan for them. The groans of other creatures are heard; how much more shall these come up in the ears of God! Whoever answers this character of a Christian pastor, may undoubtedly demand this obedience"—WESLEY.

The present section of the chapter begins (ver. 7) and ends (ver. 17) with a reference to the rulers of the Church, Remember your former leaders, and imitate their faith; obey them that lead you now. In ver. 7 the apostle exhorts them to obey those who had been their leaders, and to imitate their faith; in this he exhorts them to obey the leaders they now had, and to submit to their authority in all matters of doctrine and discipline, on the ground that they watched for their souls, and should have to give an account of their conduct to God. By his exhortation to the members of the Church, in the first place he warns also the rulers of the same, although only indirectly and in the most delicate manner, of the responsibility resting on them.

20. The everlasting covenant—"the Christian covenant, which is not temporary, like the Jewish, but designed to remain for ever. By the application of that blood by which this covenant was established, may He make you, in every respect, inwardly and outwardly holy"—WESLEY.

"The God of peace—the phrase is frequent in S. Paul (1 Thess. 5. 23; 2 Thess. 3. 16; Rom. 15. 33; 16. 20; Phil 4. 9). That brought again from the dead. Among many allusions to the ascension and glorification of Christ this is the only direct allusion in the Epistle to His resurrection (but comp. chaps. 6. 2; 11. 35). Through the blood of the everlasting covenant—rather, 'by virtue of (lit. "in") the blood of an eternal covenant.' The expression finds its full explanation in ch. 9. 15–18. Others connect it with 'the great Shepherd. He became the great Shepherd by means of His blood. So in Acts 20. 28 we have 'to shepherd the Church of God, which He purchased for Himself by means of His own blood.'

A similar phrase occurs in Zech. 9. 11"—C. B.

21. Make you perfect in every good work to do His will. "The standard of our attainable Christian perfection, as to the affections, is a love of God so perfect as to 'rule the heart,' and exclude all rivalry, and a meekness so perfect as to cast out all sinful anger, and prevent its return; and that as to good works, the rule is, that we shall be so 'perfect in every good work' as to 'do the will of God' habitually, fully, and constantly"—WATSON.

22. Suffer the word of exhortation—"addressed to you in this letter, which, though longer than my usual letters, is yet contained in few words, considering the copiousness of the subject"—WESLEY.

"The apostle, having spoken at large, closes with a few short requests, enforcing charity, the purest bond of the Church, and the perfection of faith and hope"—SUTCLIFFE.

The apostle, in conclusion, begs his readers to bear with his word of exhortation, i.e. his letter, which he so names. For . . . in few words. Another reason, besides others, for bearing with it is its brevity. This is said comparatively, in consideration of the gravity of the circumstances, and the weight of the subjects handled. The letter, it is said (Moulton), might be read aloud in less than an hour.

23. If he come—"to me"—WESLEY.

"Know ye, etc. Others render 'ye know, but it is more probable that the author is communicating a piece of intelligence. Set at liberty probably refers to an imprisonment of Timothy, of which no other historical notice occurs. Shortly, i.e. apparently, before the author is compelled or finds it convenient to leave. In that case he would bring Timothy with him. The reference to Timothy indicates that the author was on a footing of friendship with Pauline circles."

24. "Salutation to the heads of the Hebrew community. Some have found in the word all an intimation that there were various classes of leaders, e.g. some Jewish and some Gentile; but such an inference seems too large to found on such a word. They of Italy—those belonging to Italy. Whether the apostle was in Italy and sent the salutation of the Italian brethren, or was in some locality where Italians were present, whose salutations he joined with his own, cannot be decided from the words. On the last supposition the probability would be that the letter was written to Italy"—DAVIDSON.

25. Grace be with you all—"S. Paul's usual benediction. God apply it to our hearts!"—WESLEY.

This brief closing benediction is also found in Titus 3. 15, and, with the omission of all, in Col. 4. 18; 1 Tim. 6. 21; 2 Tim. 4. 22.

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

THE writer of this Epistle, according to the well-nigh unanimous opinion of ancient and modern commentators, was James the Less, known also as James the Just, who was the first Bishop of the Church in Jerusalem, and who is generally identified with James, the Lord's brother. Whether he was the same person with James the son of Alphæus, whether "James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas" (Matt. 13. 55) were really only the cousins of the Lord Jesus, or in some truer and more natural sense His "brothers," and, on the latter supposition, whether they were the sons of Joseph by a former marriage, or the younger children of Mary, whom she bore to Joseph after she had brought forth her first-born Son, are questions which it is impossible to discuss fairly within the brief limits assigned to us, At all events, James the Less, or more properly speaking the Little, to whom this Epistle is ascribed, is one of the most interesting persons in the history of primitive Christianity, one of the three who may well appear to us, as they did to S. Paul, to have been "pillars" in the rising Church; and the allusions to him and to his great influence, both in the Acts of the Apostles and in the Pauline Epistles, must be familiar to every reader of the New Testament.

The Epistle is addressed to "the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion." It will be readily understood that the numerous Jewish communities scattered throughout all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean were known as the "Dispersion." That which is peculiar is, that this Christian teacher does not address his readers as Christians, but simply as Jews, that he alludes slightly, if at all, to the most important Christian doctrines; and while, from the position of the writer, and from a few expressions in the Epistle, it may be inferred that it was intended for those who had accepted Jesus as the Messiah, at the same time other expressions suggest that it cannot have been intended for them only. Perhaps the explanation would be found in the very peculiar position of S. James, and in the respect his character had gained among all classes of his countrymen. The Christians of Jerusalem continued to frequent the Temple services, and were "all zealous of the Law." The distinction between Jews and Christians was not fundamental; they all claimed to belong to the same Church; and in fact S. James and his friends considered themselves not worse Jews but better in having become Christians. And when S. James desired to write to his fellow-Christians a letter of admonition and encouragement and exhortation, especially in reference to the practical duties of life, he thought it best to address it to all classes of his countrymen, and to write in terms which all of them would understand.

The idea was formerly entertained that one object of the Epistle was to guard the Church against those Antinomian errors which had arisen through the misinterpretation of S. Paul's doctrine of justification by faith. Modern criticism, however, appears to render it not improbable that S. James was the prior writer, and that the two Epistles, written to Churches in widely different conditions and surroundings, were entirely independent of each other.

In the continual allusions throughout the Epistle to the moral teaching of the Sermon on the Mount, the reader will be reminded that "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ," was also "the Lord's brother."

CHAPTER I.

1. The Inscription.—A servant of Jesus Christ—"whose name the apostle mentions but once more in the whole Epistle. (Ch. 2. 1.) And not at all in his whole discourse (Acts 15. 14, etc.; or 21. 20–25). It might have seemed, if he mentioned him often, that he did it out of vanity, as being the brother of the Lord. To the twelve tribes—of Israel; that is, those of them that believe. Which are scattered abroad—in various countries. Ten of the tribes were scattered ever since the reign of Hosea; and great part of the rest were now dispersed through the Roman empire: as was foretold. (Deut. 28. 25, etc.; 30. 4.) Greeting—that is, all blessings, temporal and eternal"—WESLEY.

To the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion (R.V.). "Josephus tells us that in his time one region could not contain the Jews, but that they dwelt in very large numbers in most of the flourishing cities of Asia and Europe. His statement is corroborated by S. Luke, in the Acts of the Apostles. The Jews of the Dispersion, as they were called, must have been more numerous than even the Jews in Judea"—B. "I see no reason for restricting it (the Epistle) to Jewish believers only; it was sent to all whom it might concern, but particularly to those who had received the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ"—C. "The persons addressed were the Jews at a distance from Palestine, who had admitted into their Jewish creed a recognition of Jesus as the true Messiah. They were probably in very different stages of religious development. The best of them were perhaps, like Apollos, knowing only the baptism of John"—W. W. (Acts 2. 5; 8. 1; 12. 17; 15. 13; 26. 7; Gal. 1. 19; 2. 9; Jude 1; Titus 1. 1; Deut. 32. 26; John 7. 35; 1 Pet. 1. 1.)

Vers. 2-15. THE EXHORTATION TO PATIENCE.

—2. My brethren, count it all joy—"which is the highest degree of patience, and contains all the rest—when ye fall into divers temptations—that is, trials"—WESLEY.

"The word denotes trials by afflictions and persecutions. Our Lord declares those to be blessed, who are 'persecuted for righteousness' sake' (Matt. 5. 10), and exhorted such to 'rejoice and be exceeding glad' (ver. 12), sentiments which doubtless the Apostle James had in his eye"—B. "These trials may be referred to the public troubles and commotions which preceded the outbreak of the Jewish war; or it may be still better to refer them to the persecutions which instigated and which followed the martyrdom of S. Stephen, the effect of which extended as far as the missives of the Sanhedrim had influence"—W. W. (Matt. 5. 12; Acts 5. 41; Heb. 10. 34; 1 Pet. 4. 13, 16; 1. 6.)

3. The trial (R.V. "The proof"). Worketh patience. "S. Paul uses the same words in the same connection (Rom. 5. 3). There is quite as much reason to assert that S. Paul copied these and similar expressions from S. James as that S. James borrowed them from S. Paul. Neither apostle originated a new phraseology; both adopted terms already in use, but gave them a wider range of meaning"—W. W.

4. Let patience have its perfect work—"give it full scope, under whatever trials befall you. That ye may be perfect and entire—adorned with every Christian grace—and wanting nothing—which God requires in you"—WESLEY.

Perfect and entire. "I think the expressions are borrowed from the sacrifices under the Law. A victim was 'perfect' that was perfectly sound, having no disease; it was entire, if it had all its members, having nothing redundant, nothing deficient"—C.

5. If any want. "The connection between the first and following verses, both here and in the fourth chapter, will be easily discerned by him who reads them, while he is suffering wrongfully. He will then readily perceive why the apostle mentions all those various affections of the mind. Wisdom—to understand whence and why temptations come, and how they are to be improved. Patience is in every pious man already. Let him exercise this, and ask for wisdom. The sum of wisdom, both in the temptation of poverty and of riches, is described in the ninth and tenth verses. Who giveth to all—that ask aright—and upbraideth not—either with their past wickedness, or present unworthiness"—WESLEY.

"Wisdom, in the common acceptation of the word, denotes a sound practical judgment concerning things to be done or avoided; but here the expression seems to mean wisdom to know how to conduct ourselves under afflictions, or how to make a right use of them"—B. (1 Kings 3. 9, 11, 12; Prov. 2. 3; Matt. 7. 7; 21. 22; Mark 11. 24; Luke 11. 9; John 14. 13; 15. 7; 16. 23; Jer. 29. 12; 1 John 5. 14, 15.)

6. But let him ask in faith—"a firm confidence in God. S. James also both begins and ends with faith (ch. 5. 15); the hindrances of which he removes in the middle part of his Epistle. He that doubteth (R.V.) is like a wave of the sea. Yea, such are all who have not asked and obtained wisdom. Driven with the wind—from without—and tossed—from within, by his own unstableness"—WESLEY.

"To be sometimes lifted up by faith, and then thrown down again by distrust; to mount sometimes towards the heavens, with an intention to secure glory and honour and immortality, and then to sink again, in seeking the ease of the body, or the enjoyments of this world—this is very fitly and elegantly compared to a wave of the sea, that rises and falls, swells and sinks, just as the wind tosses it higher or lower, that way or this"—M. H. (Mark 16. 14; 1 Tim. 2. 8.)

7. Let not that man think. "Such unreasonable doubts and suspicions, as they wrong the Divine goodness, so they may prevent the communication of those favours which might otherwise be obtained"—B.

8. A double-minded man—"who has, as it were, two souls; whose heart is not simply given up to God—is unstable—being without the true wisdom; perpetually disagrees both with himself and others. (Ch. 3. 16)"—WESLEY.

"The man of two souls, one for earth, and another for heaven; who wishes to secure both worlds; he will not give up earth, and he is loth to let heaven go"—C. "When our faith and spirits rise and fall with second causes, there will be great unsteadiness in all our conversation and actions. He that is unstable as water shall not excel"—M. H. (Ch. 4. 8.)

9. Let the brother—"S. James does not give this appellation to the rich—of low degree—poor and tempted—rejoice—the most effectual remedy against double-mindedness—in that he is exalted—to be a child of God, and an heir of glory"—WESLEY.

10. But the rich, in that he is made low—"is humbled by a deep sense of his true condition. Because as the flower—beautiful, but transient—he shall pass away—into eternity"—WESLEY.

"The poor destitute Christian may glory in the cross of Christ, and the blessed hope laid up for him in heaven; and the rich in his humiliation, in his being brought to the foot of the cross, to receive, as a poor sinner, redemption through the blood of the cross"—C. "It is taken for granted that the poor will rejoice; but the principal design is to show what is not so obvious, that the rich hath a truer cause and a greater reason to rejoice, because he was otherwise apt to please himself or be mocked with a shadow"—H. "The apostle advises the rich to glory when they lose the uncertain riches of this life, and are exposed to other sufferings, for the sake of truth and a good conscience"—B. (Job 14. 2; Ps. 37. 2; 90. 5, 6; 102. 11; 103. 15; Isa. 40. 6; 1 Cor. 7. 31; ch. 4. 14; 1 Pet. 1. 24; 1 John 2. 17.)

11. For the sun arose and withered the grass. "There is an unspeakable beauty and elegance, both in the comparison itself, and in the very manner of expressing it, intimating both the certainty and the suddenness of the event. So shall the rich man fade away in his ways—in the midst of his various pleasures and enjoyments"—WESLEY.

"In his goings, or journeyings, perhaps with special reference to the restlessness in trading which showed itself in the money-making Jews of Palestine"—C. B.

12. Happy is the man that endureth temptation—"trials of various kinds. He shall receive the crown—that fadeth not away—which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him—and his enduring proves his love. For it is love only that 'endureth all things'"—WESLEY.

"The mode of teaching by beatitudes reminds us at once of the Sermon on the Mount, with which the Epistle has many points of contact. Stress is laid on enduring as distinct from simply 'suffering.' The image of the crown, or wreath, of the conqueror for the reward of the righteous is common both to S. Peter who speaks of the 'crown of glory' (1 Pet. 5. 4), and to S. Paul who speaks of the 'crown of righteousness' (2 Tim. 4. 8). The crown of life, i.e. of eternal life, which is the crown, is, however, peculiar to S. James"—C. B. (Job 5. 17; Prov. 3. 11, 12; Heb. 12. 5; Rev. 3. 19; 1 Cor. 9. 25; 2 Tim. 4. 8; ch. 2. 5; 1 Pet. 5. 4; Rev. 2. 10; Matt. 10. 22; 19. 28, 29.)

13. Let no man who is tempted—"to sin—say, I am tempted of God—God thus tempteth no man"—WESLEY.

"The thought of trial coming from without, and forming part of man's spiritual education, leads to a deeper inquiry as to its nature, and so passes on to the wider notion of temptation, which includes the allurements of desire as well as the trials of adversity. In both cases men found refuge from the reproof of conscience in a kind of fatalism. God had placed them in such and such circumstances; therefore, He was the author of the sin to which those circumstances had led. Cannot be tempted to evil. The latent premiss of the reasoning seems to be, that no one tempts to evil, who has not been first himself tempted by it"—C. B.

14. Every man is tempted when—"in the beginning of the temptation—he is drawn away—drawn out of God, his strong refuge. By his own desire. We are therefore to look for the cause of every sin, in, not out of, ourselves. Even the injections of the devil cannot hurt us before we make them our own. And every one has desires arising from his own constitution, tempers, habits, and way of life. And enticed—in the progress of temptation, catching at the bait; so the original word signifies"—WESLEY.

"Both participles are primarily used of the way in which animals are taken, the first of capture by the hook or noose, as with fish or the crocodile, the second of beasts or birds which are attracted by food set for them as a bait. Both words had come to be used figuratively of sensual passion"—C. B.

15. Then desire having conceived—"by our own will joining therewith—bringeth forth actual sin. It does not follow that the desire itself is not sin. He that begets a man is himself a man. And sin being perfected (R.V. 'Full grown')—grown up to maturity, which it quickly does. Bringeth forth death—sin is born big with death"—WESLEY.

"S. James represents men's lust as a harlot, which entices their understanding and will into its impure embraces, and from that conjunction conceives sin. And sin, being brought forth and nourished, by frequent repetitions, in its turn begets death, which destroys the sinner. This is the true genealogy of sin and death"—M'K. "Death—the loss of the true life of the soul, which consists in its capacity for knowing God. In looking at the allegory as a whole, we note (1) its agreement as to the relation of sin and death with the teaching of S. Paul (Rom. 5. 12); (2) its resemblance to like allegories in the literature of other nations, as in the well-known choice of Hercules, where pleasure appears with the garb and allurements of a harlot; (3) its expansion in the marvellous allegory of sin and death in Milton's Paradise Lost (Book ii.)"—C. B. (Job 15. 35; Ps. 7. 14; Rom. 6. 21, 23.)

Vers. 16–27. GOD'S GOODNESS THE MOTIVE OF TRUE OBEDIENCE.—16. Do not err. "It is a grievous error to ascribe the evil and not the good which we receive to God"—WESLEY.

17. "No evil, but every good gift—whatever tends to holiness—descendeth from the Father of lights. The appellation of Father is here used with peculiar propriety. It follows, 'He begat us.' He is the Father of all light, material or spiritual, in the kingdom of grace and of glory. With whom is no variableness—no change in His understanding—or shadow of turning—in His will. He infallibly discerns all good and evil; and invariably loves one, and hates the other. There is, in both the Greek words, a metaphor taken from the stars, particularly proper where the 'Father of lights' is mentioned. Both are applicable to any celestial body, which has a daily vicissitude of day and night, and sometimes longer days, sometimes longer nights. In God is nothing of this kind. He is mere light. If there is any such vicissitude, it is in ourselves, not in Him"—WESLEY.

No variableness, neither shadow of turning (R.V. "No variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning"). The terms are scientific terms, describing the changes in the apparent position of the heavenly bodies, and the interception of the light of the sun itself. "With Him is nothing analogous to those optical delusions, those periodical obscurations, those vicissitudes of seasons which attend the annual and diurnal course of the sun. He sends forth His light without mixture of shade, His gifts without niggardliness"—W. W. "Will He give us holy desires at one time, and evil inclinations at another? No; He always gives us what is good, and nothing but good. It is blasphemous, therefore, as well as absurd, to suppose that God either tempts or constrains men to sin"—M'K. (John 3. 29; 1 Cor. 4. 7; Num. 23. 19; 1 Sam. 15. 29; Mal. 3. 6; Rom. 11. 29.)

18. Of His own will—"most loving, most free, most pure, just opposite to our evil desire (ver. 15). Begat He us—who believe—by the word of truth—the true word, emphatically so termed; the gospel. That we might be a kind of first-fruits of His creatures. Christians are the chief and most excellent of His visible creatures; and sanctify the rest. Yet He says, a kind of—for Christ alone is absolutely 'the first-fruits'"—WESLEY.

"Notice (1) A true Christian is a creature begotten anew; he becomes as different a person from what he was before the renewing influences of Divine grace, as if he were formed over again, and born afresh. (2) The origin of this good work is here declared. It is of God's own will; not by our skill or power, but purely from the goodwill and grace of God. (3) The means whereby this is effected are pointed out. The word of truth—that is, the gospel, as S. Paul expresses it more plainly (1 Cor. 4. 15), 'I have begotten you in Jesus Christ through the gospel.' (4) The end and design of God's giving renewing grace is here laid down. That we should be a kind of first-fruits of His creatures—that we should be God's portion and treasure, and a more peculiar property to Him, as the first-fruits were; and that we should become holy to the Lord, as the first-fruits were consecrated to Him. Christ is the first-fruits of Christians, Christians are the first-fruits of creatures"—M. H. (John 1. 13; 3. 3; 1 Cor. 4. 15; 1 Pet. 1. 23; Eph. 1. 12; Jer. 2. 3; Rev. 14. 4.)

19. Let every man be swift to hear. "This is treated of from ver. 21 to the end of the next chapter. Slow to speak—which is treated of in the third chapter. Slow to wrath—neither murmuring at God, nor angry at his neighbour. This is treated of in the third and throughout the fourth and fifth chapters"—WESLEY.

Wherefore—"since you are regenerated, and that by the word of God, therefore—let every man be swift to hear that word, let him be willing and desirous to receive instruction from it. Slow to speak—to deliver his opinion in matters of faith, that he does not yet well understand. Persons half instructed frequently have a high opinion of their own knowledge in religious matters, are very fond of teaching others, and zealous to bring them over to their opinions. Slow to wrath—against those that differ from him. Intemperate religious zeal is often accompanied by a train of bad passions, and particularly with anger against those who differ from us in opinion. The Jews, even the Jewish Christians to whom this letter was chiefly written, were very faulty in this respect. The apostle, however, may be understood as cautioning his readers against easily yielding to provocation in any respect whatever, and especially when injuriously treated by their persecutors"—B. (Eccles. 5. 1; Prov. 10. 19; 17. 27; Eccles. 5. 2; Prov. 14. 47; 16. 32; Eccles. 7. 9.)

20. The righteousness of God—"here includes all duties prescribed by Him and pleasing to Him"—WESLEY.

The wrath of man—"even when it appears in the garb of religious zeal—worketh not—but on the contrary greatly obstructs—the righteousness of God. Instead of promoting the cause of true religion in the world, it is a reproach to it, and a means of exciting the prejudices of mankind against it"—B.

21. Therefore laying aside—"as a dirty garment—all the filthiness and superfluity of wickedness—for however specious or necessary it may appear to worldly wisdom, all wickedness is both vile, hateful, and contemptible, and really superfluous. Every reasonable end may be effectually answered without any kind or degree of it. Lay this, every known sin aside, or all your hearing is vain. With meekness—constant evenness and serenity of mind. Receive—into your ears, your heart, your life—the word—of the gospel. Ingrafted—in believers, by regeneration (ver. 18); and by habit (Heb. 5. 14). Which is able to save your souls—the hope of salvation nourishes meekness"—WESLEY.

Overflowing of wickedness . . . the implanted word (R.V.). "We are taught, as Christians, to watch against and lay aside, not only those more gross and fleshly dispositions which may denominate a person filthy, but all the disorders of a corrupt and naughty heart, which would prejudice it against the word and ways of God"—M'K. "We note the agreement of S. James' teaching with the parable of the sower, where 'the seed is the word,' and the conditions of its fertility are found in the 'honest and good heart,' free from prejudice and bitterness. Moral discipline, the putting away of that which defiles, is the right preparation for the highest spiritual life"—C. B. Able to save your souls. "The apostle does not add, 'through faith which is in Christ Jesus,' as S. Paul (2 Tim. 3. 15); for the word here is the truth of the gospel, not the Old Testament Scriptures"—W. W. (Col. 3. 8; 1 Pet. 2. 1; Acts 13. 26; Rom. 1. 16; 1 Cor. 15. 2; Eph. 1. 13; Titus 2. 11; Heb. 2. 13; 1. Pet. 1. 9.)

22. Doers of the word, and not hearers only. There is an evident allusion to the close of the Sermon on the Mount, which appears to have been in the apostle's mind in writing the whole Epistle. (Matt. 7. 21; Luke 6. 46; 11. 48; Rom. 2. 13; 1 John 3. 7.)

23. Beholding his face in a glass. "How exactly does the Scripture glass show a man the face of his soul!"—WESLEY.

24. He beheld himself, and went away—"to other business—and forgot—but such forgetting does not excuse"—WESLEY.

In a mirror (R.V.). "The mirrors in use among the Jews, Greeks, and Romans were of polished metal, and presented a less perfect image than our modern mirrors. Here, however, stress is laid on the fact that the mirror does supply, in some degree, the self-knowledge which the man could not attain without it"—C. B. "As the looking-glass shows us the spots and defilements upon our faces, that they may be remedied and washed off, so the word of God shows us our sins, that we may repent of them and get them pardoned; and shows us what is amiss, that it may be amended. But in vain do we hear God's word, and look into the gospel glass, if we go away, and forget our spots, instead of washing them off"—M'K. (Luke 6. 47; ch. 2. 14.)

25. But he that looketh diligently—"not with a transient glance, but 'bending down,' fixing his eyes, and searching all to the bottom. Into the perfect law—of love, as established by faith. S. James here guards us against misunderstanding what S. Paul says concerning the 'yoke and bondage of the Law.' He who keeps the law of love is free (John 8. 31, etc.). He that does not, is not free, but a slave to sin, and a criminal before God (ch. 2. 10). And continueth therein—not like him who forgot it, and went away. This man—there is a peculiar force in the repetition of the words—shall be happy—not barely in hearing, but doing the will of God"—WESLEY.

The perfect law, the law of liberty (R.V.). "Called the perfect law, because of its superiority to the Law of Moses, which made no man perfect, either in respect of justification or sanctification (Heb. 7. 19), whereas the gospel is calculated to make men perfect in both respects. And it is the law of liberty, because those who receive it render a free, loving obedience, from an inward vital principle"—W. W. Blessed in his deed. "S. James returns to the form of a beatitude, and brings together the beginning and the end of the Sermon on the Mount"—C. B. (2 Cor. 3. 18; 2. 12; John 13. 17.)

26. If anyone be ever so religious—"exact in the outward offices of religion—and bridleth not his tongue—from backbiting, tale-bearing, evil-speaking, he only deceiveth his own heart, if he fancies he has any true religion at all"—WESLEY.

Thinketh himself to be religious (R.V.). Sins of the tongue were the prevailing sins of the age in which S. James wrote, as other parts of the Epistle fully show. (Ps. 34. 13; 39. 1; 1 Pet. 3. 10.)

27. "The only true religion in the sight of God is this, to visit—with counsel, comfort, and relief—the fatherless and widows—those who need it most—in their affliction—in their most helpless and hopeless state. And to keep himself unspotted from the world—from the maxims, customs, and tempers of it. But this cannot be done till we have given our hearts to God, and love our neighbour as ourselves"—WESLEY.

"In the epithets pure and undefiled, Archbishop Tillotson thinks there is an allusion to the excellence of a precious stone, which consists much in its being clear and without a flaw or cloud. Perhaps, however, the terms are chosen with reference to the Pharisees' scrupulous care to avoid ceremonial defilement. S.

James reproduces our Lord's teaching, that real defilement comes from within, and that true purity is found in 'giving alms of such things as we have'"—C. B. "What is this religion? It consists not in speculations and notions, however just and orthodox; not in forms or modes of worship, however scriptural and necessary to be observed; not in the warmth of affection, or ardour of zeal, during worship. But in consequence of repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, of justification by faith, and regeneration by the influence of the Divine Spirit, it consists in the possession and exercise of that love to God and all mankind, which is the source of the various branches of practical religion, of mercy as well as justice towards men, and of holiness towards God"—B. (Isa. 1. 16, 17; 58. 6, 7; Matt. 25. 36; Rom. 12. 2; ch. 4. 4; 1 John 5. 18.)

CHAPTER II.

Vers. 1–13. RESPECT OF PERSONS.—1. My brethren—"the equality of Christians, intimated by this name, is the ground of admonition—hold not the faith of our common Lord, the Lord of glory—of which glory all who believe in Him partake—with respect of persons—that is, honour none merely for being rich; despise none merely for being poor"—WESLEY.

"The name of our Lord Jesus Christ is used obviously with a special force. He had shown Himself, through His whole life on earth, to be no respecter of persons (Matt. 22. 16), to have preferred the poor to the rich. The motive of the addition is clear. In believing in Him who was emphatically a sharer in the eternal glory (John 17. 5), who had now returned to that glory, men ought to feel the infinite littleness of the accidents of wealth and rank that separate man from man"—C. B. (1 Cor. 2. 8; Lev. 19. 5; Deut. 1. 17; 16. 19; Prov. 24. 23; 28. 21; Matt. 22. 16; ver. 9; Jude 16.)

2. With gold rings—"which were not then so common as now"—WESLEY.

Lit. a gold-ringed man. The wearing of rings was carried by the ancients and by Orientals to an excess and pitch of ostentation which are now unknown. Martial tells of a man who wore six rings on every finger, day and night, and even in the bath.

3. Ye look upon him—"with respect"—WESLEY.

Stand thou here. "The Christian, probably the elder or the deacon, is supposed to point the poor man to his place at the other end of the synagogue, far from sight and hearing, giving him the alternative of a seat on the ground, just below what we should call the 'stall,' in which the rich man was invited to take his place, with a stool for his feet to rest on"—C. B.

4. Ye distinguish not—"to which the most respect is due, to the poor or to the rich. But are become evil-reasoning judges. You reason ill, and so judge wrong; for fine apparel is no proof of worth in him who wears it"—WESLEY.

Are ye not partial in yourselves? (R.V. "divided in your own mind"). The verb is the same as that translated "waver" in ch. 1. 6, and elsewhere, as in Matt. 21. 21, by "doubt." Nor is any other meaning necessary or admissible here. "When you acted in this way, did you not doubt, as others doubt, in your own hearts?" Faith in Christ's words as to the deceitfulness of riches, and the little honour due to them, would have kept men from such servility. They showed by their action that they were half-hearted, or, in S. James' sense of the word, "double-minded."

5. Hearken—"as if he had said, Stay, consider, ye that judge thus. Does not the presumption lie rather in favour of the poor man? Hath not God chosen the poor—that is, are not they whom God hath chosen, generally speaking, poor in this world? who yet are rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom—consequently, the most honourable of men; and those whom God so highly honours, ought not ye to honour likewise?"—WESLEY.

"It is scarcely possible to exclude a direct reference to the words of Christ, as in Luke 6. 20; 12. 31, 32; and so we get indirect proof of a current knowledge, at the early period at which S. James wrote, of teaching that was afterwards recorded in the written Gospels"—C. B. To them that love Him. Men are not to suppose that poverty itself is a sufficient title to the inheritance. There must be the faith that worketh by love. What S. James presses is, that poverty should be respected rather than wealth, as having been singled out by Christ for special blessings. (John 7. 48; 1 Cor. 1. 26, 28; Luke 12. 21; 1 Tim. 6. 18; Rev. 2. 9; Ex. 20. 6; 1 Sam. 2. 30; Prov. 8. 17; Matt. 5. 3; Luke 6. 20; 12. 32; 1 Cor. 2. 9; 2 Tim. 4. 8; ch. 1. 12.)

6. Do not the rich often oppress you—"by open violence; often drag you—under colour of law"—WESLEY.

7. Do not they blaspheme that worthy name—"of God and Christ. The apostle speaks chiefly of rich heathens; but are Christians, so-called, a whit behind them?"—WESLEY.

"You have little reason to show so much respect to them, if you consider what their carriage towards you has been. Are not most of the rich men your persecutors rather than your friends?"—B. By which ye are called. It would appear as if the name "Christians" had come into general use when this Epistle was written. (1 Cor. 11. 22; Acts 13. 50; 17. 6; 18. 12; ch. 5. 6.)

8. If ye fulfil the royal law—"the supreme law of the great King, which is love; and that to every man, poor as well as rich, ye do well"—WESLEY.

"The phrase, royal law, admits of three interpretations—(1) as the Greeks called a thing 'royal,' which was excellent in itself, it may mean an excellent law; (2) as the same Greeks called the laws of the kings of Persia 'royal laws,' the expression here may signify 'the law of Christ our King'; (3) this law, enjoining us to love our neighbour, may be called the royal law, because it inspires us with a greatness of mind fit for kings"—B. (Lev. 19. 18; Matt. 22. 39; Rom. 13. 8, 9; Gal. 5. 14; 6. 2.) Evangelical love is a master principle, containing in itself a law, well called the royal law, being one which comprehends all duties, and embraces all objects"—W. W.

9. Being convicted—"by that very law"—WESLEY.

10. Whosoever keepeth the whole Law, except in one point, he is guilty of all—"is as liable to condemnation as if he had offended in every point"—WESLEY.

"There is scarcely any form of speech more common among the Rabbins than this, for they consider that any one sin has the seeds of all others in it"—C. "The meaning is, that all the commandments being equally enjoined by God, the man who despises the authority of God, so far as to break any one of them habitually, would, in the like circumstances of temptation and opportunity, certainly break any other of them; consequently, in the eye of God, he is guilty of breaking the whole; that is, he hath no real principle of piety or virtue in him"—B. (Deut. 27. 26; Matt. 5. 19; Gal. 3. 10.)

11. "For it is the same authority which establishes every commandment"—WESLEY.

"Some of the Jewish doctors affirmed, that by observing any one precept of the Law with care, men secured to themselves the favour of God, notwithstanding they neglected all the rest. Wherefore they recommended it to their disciples to make choice of a particular precept, in the keeping of which they were to exercise themselves. This corrupt Jewish doctrine S. James here expressly condemns"—B. (Ex. 20. 13, 14.)

12. So speak and act—"in all things—as they that shall be judged—without respect of persons. By the law of liberty—the gospel; the law of universal love, which alone is perfect freedom. For their trangressions of this, both in word and deed, the wicked shall be condemned; and according to their works, done in obedience to this, the righteous will be rewarded"—WESLEY.

"The thoughts of the teacher dwell, as in other passages, on sins of speech as no less tests of character than sins of acts. In so doing he was echoing the words of a greater Teacher (Matt. 12. 37). The law of liberty. The recurrence of the phrase indicates a certain fondness for the thought. The phrase is peculiar to S. James, but the idea is found in John 8. 32"—C. B. (Ch. 1. 25.)

13. Judgment without mercy shall be to him—"in that day—who hath showed no mercy—to his poor brethren. But the mercy of God to believers, answering to that which they have shown will then glory over judgment"—WESLEY.

Judgment without mercy. "The sentiment is the same as our Lord's (Matt. 18. 31), and in the oft-quoted Sermon on the Mount. (Matt. 7. 1, 2.) Everyone who remembers that he has to stand before the Divine tribunal will be convinced how much he needs the Divine mercy. Mercy rejoiceth against judgment—not only rejoices, but awaits the judgment with confidence"—W. W. (Job 22. 6; Prov. 21. 13; Matt. 6. 15; 18. 35; 25. 41, 42; 1 John 4. 17, 18.)

Vers. 14–26. TRUE FAITH ALWAYS ACCOMPANIED BY WORKS.—14. "From ch. 1. 22, the apostle has been enforcing Christian practice. He now applies to those who neglect this, under the pretence of faith. S. Paul had taught that 'a man is justified by faith without the works of the Law.' This some began already to wrest to their own destruction. Wherefore S. James, purposely repeating (vers. 21, 23, 25) the same phrases, testimonies, and examples which S. Paul had used (Rom. 4. 3; Heb. 11. 17, 31), refutes not the doctrine of S. Paul, but the error of those who abused it. There is, therefore, no contradiction between the apostles; they both delivered the truth of God, but in a different manner, as having to do with different kinds of men. On another occasion S. James himself pleaded the cause of faith (Acts 15. 13–21); and S. Paul himself strenuously pleads for works, particularly in his later Epistles. This verse is a summary of what follows. What profiteth it? is enlarged on (vers. 15–17); though a man say (vers. 18, 19); can that faith save him? (ver. 20). It is not, though he have faith; but, though he say he have faith. Here, therefore, true, living faith is meant; but in other parts of the argument the apostle speaks of a dead, imaginary faith. He does not, therefore, teach that true faith can, but that it cannot, subsist without works; nor does he oppose faith to works; but that empty name of faith, to real faith working by love. Can that faith 'which is without works' save him? No more than it can profit his neighbour"—WESLEY.

Mr. Wesley's Note takes it for granted that the Epistle before us was written subsequently to S. Paul's Epistles, and that it was intended to guard against the abuse of his doctrine. More recent commentators consider that S. James does not refer to S. Paul at all, and indeed that most probably his Epistle was written first. The fact that each writer speaks of the justification of Abraham is not regarded as proving anything. It would scarcely be possible for a Jewish writer to avoid such a reference. "The teaching of S. James was not meant to be antagonistic to that of S. Paul, or even to correct mistaken inferences from it, but was altogether independent, and probably prior in time, moving in its own groove, and taking its own line of thought. He writes primarily to the Jews of the Dispersion. The faults which he reproves are pre-eminently the faults of the race. Men dwelling, as these Jews dwell, in the midst of a heathen population, were tempted to trust for their salvation to their descent from Abraham, and to their maintaining the unity of the Godhead against the polytheism and idolatry of the nations. They repeated their creed (known from its first Hebrew word as the Shema), 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord,' at the morning and evening services in the synagogue. It was uttered by the dying, as the passport to the gates of Paradise. It was to this that they referred the words of Habakkuk, that the 'just shall live by faith' (Hab. 2. 4). S. James saw, as the Baptist had seen, how destructive all this was of the reality of the spiritual life"—C. B. "The persons addressed, in their Jewish state, relied for salvation on their descent from Abraham. In place of this they now substituted the mere acknowledgment of abstract truth, and historical matters of fact, regarding God and Christ"—W. W. Can faith save him? (R.V. "Can that faith save him?"). (Matt. 7. 26; ch. 1. 23.)

15. If a brother or sister. "We are taught that, as love is an operative principle, so is faith, or that neither of them is good for anything; and by trying how it looks for a person to pretend to be very charitable, who yet never does any work of charity, you may judge what sense there is in pretending to have faith without the proper and necessary fruits of it"—M. H. (Job 31. 19, 20; Luke 3. 11; 1 John 3. 18.)

17. "So likewise that faith which hath not works is a mere dead, empty notion; of no more profit to him that hath it than the bidding the naked be clothed is to him"—WESLEY.

Dead, being alone (R.V. "Dead in itself"). "The principle severed from the act is an unreality, a principle of life and action without life or action"—W. W.

18. But one—"who judges better—will say—to such a vain talker—show me, if thou canst, thy faith without thy works"—WESLEY.

The man that relied on faith is challenged to exhibit it, if he can, as a distinct entity, apart from works. It is assumed that no such exhibition is possible. (Ch. 3. 13.)

19. Thou believest there is one God. "I allow this; but this proves only that thou hast the same faith with the devils. Nay, they not only believe, but tremble—at the dreadful expectation of eternal torment. So far is that faith from either justifying or saving them that have it"—WESLEY.

It may be observed that S. James alludes to a Jewish rather than a Christian profession of faith, which strengthens the opinion that he does not refer to S. Paul's teaching. Tremble (R.V. "Shudder"). The devils spoken of are the "demons," or unclean spirits, of the Gospels and the Acts. The apostle refers to the acknowledgments so often made in his hearing by evil spirits. Here was an instance in which belief in a dogma, as distinguished from trust in a Person, brought with it no consciousness of peace or pardon. (Matt. 8. 29; Mark 1. 24; 5. 7; Luke 4. 34; Acts 16. 17; 19. 15.)

20. But art thou willing to know? "Indeed thou art not; thou wouldst fain be ignorant of it. O empty man—empty of all goodness—that the faith which is without works is dead—and so is not properly faith, as a dead carcase is not a man"—WESLEY.

Dead (R.V. "Barren"). "Art thou willing to be instructed in the nature of true saving faith? Then attend to the following examples:—

21. Was not Abraham justified by works? "S. Paul says he was justified by faith (Rom. 4. 2, etc.); yet S. James does not contradict him; for he does not speak of the same justification. S. Paul speaks of that which Abraham received many years before Isaac was born (Gen. 15. 6); S. James, of that which he did not receive till he had offered up Isaac on the altar. He was justified, therefore, in S. Paul's sense (that is, accounted righteous), by faith, antecedent to his works. He was justified in S. James' sense (that is, made righteous) by works, consequent to his faith. So that S. James' justification by works is the fruit of S. Paul's justification by faith"—WESLEY.

"Did not his works manifest the truth and liveliness of his faith, when, in consequence of the full persuasion he had of a Divine command to do it, he offered Isaac his son upon the altar—intending, in obedience to what he apprehended to be the will of God, actually to have slain him, and to have trusted in God to accomplish the promise of a numerous seed to descend from him, by raising him from the dead"—B. (Gen. 22. 9, 12; Heb. 1. 17-19.)

22. Thou seest that faith—"for by faith Abraham offered him. (Heb. 11. 17.) Wrought together with his works—therefore faith has one energy and operation; works, another; and the energy and operation of faith are before works, and 'together with' them. Works do not give life to faith, but faith begets works, and then is perfected by them. And by works was faith made perfect. Here S. James fixes the sense wherein he uses the word 'justified'; so that no shadow of contradiction remains between his assertion and S. Paul's. Abraham returned from that sacrifice perfected in faith, and far higher in the favour of God. Faith hath not its being from works (for it is before them), but its perfection. That vigour of faith which begets works is then excited and increased thereby, as the natural heat of the body begets motion, whereby itself is then excited and increased. (See 1 John 3. 22)"—WESLEY.

"Here is a proof that faith cannot exist without being active in works of righteousness. His faith in God would have been of no avail to him, had it not been manifested by works; for by works, by his obedience to the command of God, his faith was made perfect. It dictated obedience, he obeyed, and thus faith had its consummation. Even true faith will soon die, if its possessor do not live in the spirit of obedience"—C. "It may be added, as pointing to the true reconciliation of S. Paul and S. James, that the very form of the statement implies that the faith existed prior to the works by which it was made perfect"—C. B.

23. And the Scripture—"which was afterwards written—was hereby eminently fulfilled, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness. This was twice fulfilled,—when Abraham first believed, and when he offered up Isaac. S. Paul speaks of the former fulfilling; S. James, of the latter. And he was called the friend of God—both by his posterity (2 Chron. 20. 7), and by God Himself (Isa. 41. 8), so pleasing to God were the works he wrought in faith"—WESLEY.

Was fulfilled—"was true when Abraham first believed the promise as to his seed (Gen. 15. 6); but its truth was shown more fully when he offered up Isaac"—W. W. (Gen. 15. 6; Rom. 4. 3; Gal. 3. 6; 2 Chron. 20. 7; Isa. 41. 8.) The friend of God. "Abraham was so called in Jewish tradition; and to this day this is his name among his descendants, the Arabs, who much more commonly speak of him as 'the friend' (El Khalil), or 'the friend of God' (El Khalil Allah), than by the name Abraham. Nowhere in the Old Testament does he receive this name, although both our versions would lead us to suppose that he is so called. In 2 Chron. 20. 7, 'Abraham Thy friend' should be 'Abraham Thy beloved,' and in Isa. 41. 8, 'Abraham My friend' should be 'Abraham whom I loved'"—E.

24. Ye see then that a man is justified by works, and not by faith only. "S. Paul, on the other hand, declares, 'A man is justified by faith,' and not by works (Rom. 3. 28). And yet there is no contradiction between the apostles—because (1) they do not speak of the same faith: S. Paul speaking of living faith; S. James here, of dead faith. (2) They do not speak of the same works: S. Paul speaking of works antecedent to faith; S. James, of works subsequent to it"—WESLEY.

"S. Paul assumes that faith will work by love, and be productive of good acts, while the works which he excludes from the office of justifying are 'works of the Law,' works which, whether ceremonial or moral, are done by constrained obedience to an external commandment, and are not the spontaneous outcome of love, and therefore of faith. It will be felt that S. James presents the more practical, S. Paul the deeper and more mystical aspect of the truth"—C. B.

25. "After Abraham, the father of the Jews, the apostle cites Rahab, a woman, and a sinner of the Gentiles; to show that in every nation and sex true faith produces works, and is perfected by them; that is, by the grace of God working in the believer, while he is showing his faith by his works"—WESLEY.

"In her case also faith led to action, and the action had its result in the salvation of the agent. If there had been faith without action, if she had merely believed the spies without doing anything in consequence of her belief, she would have perished. But the contrast between Abraham and Rahab is almost as marked as the similarity. He is the friend of God, and she is of a vile heathen nation, and a harlot. His is the crowning act of his spiritual development; hers is the first sign of a faith just beginning. But according to her light, which was that of a very faulty moral standard, she did what she could, and she was accepted. These contrasts have their place in the argument. The readers of the Epistle might say, Heroic acts are all very suitable for Abraham, but we are not Abrahams; we must be content with sharing his faith in the true God, we cannot imitate his acts. But, S. James replies, there is Rahab the heathen, Rahab the harlot; at least you can imitate her. And for the Jewish Christians of that day her example was very much in point. She welcomed and believed the messengers, whom her countrymen persecuted and would have slain. She separated herself from her unbelieving and hostile people, and went over to an unpopular and despised cause. She saved the preachers of an unwelcome message for the fulfilment of their Divine mission. Substitute the apostles for the spies, and all this is true of the believing Jews of that age. And as if to suggest this lesson, S. James speaks not of young men, as Josh. 6. 23, nor of spies (Heb. 11. 31), but of 'messengers'"—E. (Josh. 2. 1.)

26. Faith without works is dead. "(1) The best outward works, without faith, are dead; they want their root and vital principle. (2) The most plausible profession of faith without works is dead, as the root is dead when it does not vegetate, when it produces no fruit. Faith is the root, good works are the fruits, and we must see to it that we have both"—B.

CHAPTER III.

Vers. 1–12. CAUTIONS AGAINST SINS OF SPEECH.—1. Be not many teachers—"let no more of you take this upon you than God thrusts out; seeing it is so hard not to offend in speaking much. Knowing that we—that all who thrust themselves into the office—shall receive greater condemnation—for more offences. S. James here, as in several of the following verses, by a common figure of speech, includes himself: we shall receive—we offend—we put bits—we curse—none of which, as common sense shows, are to be interpreted either of him or of the other apostles"—WESLEY.

Greater condemnation (R.V. "Heavier judgment"). The great desire which the Jewish Christians had to become teachers in the Church after their conversion, and to inculcate the Law of Moses, is noticed by S. Paul. (1 Tim. 1. 6.) We shall receive greater condemnation—"through taking upon us an office, in the exercise of which more is required of us, in many respects, than of others in a more private station of life"—B. (Matt. 23. 8, 14; Rom. 2. 20, 21; 1 Pet. 5. 3; Luke 6. 37.)

2. We offend all (R.V. "We all stumble"). "As in Scripture, 'walking' denotes the course of a man's conduct, 'stumbling,' in this passage, signifies those lesser failings in duty, to which common Christians are liable"—B. "Some have produced these words as an argument that no man can live without sinning against God. Were that doctrine as true as it is dangerous and false, it is foolish to ground it upon such a text; because S. James, as in the previous verse, includes himself in his address to his readers"—C. The same is able to bridle the whole body—"that is, the whole man. And doubtless some are able to do this, and so are in this sense perfect"—WESLEY.

A perfect man—"one who has attained the fulness of moral growth, as in 1 Cor. 14. 20; Heb. 5. 14 (the same word), denotes that of physical growth. Control of speech is mentioned, not as constituting perfection, but as a crucial test indicating whether the man has or has not attained to it"—C. B. (1 Kings 8. 46; 2 Chron. 6. 36; Prov. 20. 9; Eccles. 7. 20; 1 John 1. 8; Ps. 34. 13; ch. 1. 26; 1 Pet. 3. 10; Matt. 12. 37.)

3. We—"that is, men"—WESLEY.

If we put the horses' bridles into their mouths, that they may obey us, we turn about their whole body also (R.V.). "A man who can govern his tongue can govern his whole nature, just as a bridle controls, not merely the horse's mouth, but his whole body"—E. (Ps. 32. 9.)

4. Behold also the ships . . . the governor (R.V. "the impulse of the steersman"). "The point is the same, viz. the smallness of the part to be controlled in order to have control over the whole"—E.

5. Boasteth great things—"hath great influence"—WESLEY.

"The smallness of the instrument is the link of association. The antithesis between diminutive size and mighty power suggests the notion of a spark of fire, the smallest of visible agents, yet productive of the most widely wasting and terrific effects"—W. W. "The argument now takes a somewhat different turn, and the necessity of curbing the tongue is shown, not only from its great power, but from its inherent malignity—if left unchecked it is certain to do incalculable mischief"—E. (Prov. 12. 18; 15. 2; Ps. 12. 3; 73. 8, 9.)

6. A world of iniquity—"containing an immense quantity of all manner of wickedness. It defileth—as fire by its smoke—the whole body—the whole man. And setteth on fire the course of nature—all the passions, every wheel of his soul"—WESLEY.

The wheel of nature (R.V.). "The tongue defiles us in three ways—by suggesting sin to ourselves and others; by committing sin, as in cases of lying and blasphemy; and by excusing or defending sin"—T. The wheel of nature. "The best interpretation seems to be that which sees in the phrase a figure of 'the whole life from birth,' the wheel which then begins to roll on its course, and continues rolling until death. What is meant, if we adopt this view, is that from the beginning of life to its close, the tongue is an ever-present, inflammatory element of evil"—C. B. "The conjectural interpretations are numerous, of which one must suffice. The tongue is a centre from which mischief radiates; that is the main thought. A wheel that has caught fire at the axle is at last wholly consumed, as the fire spreads through the spokes to the circumference. So also in society. Passions kindled by unscrupulous language spread through various channels and classes, till the whole cycle of human life is in flames"—E. And it is set on fire of hell. "S. James does not shrink from tracing sins of speech to their source. Bearing in our minds the wonder of the day of Pentecost, it is hardly too bold to say that we have to choose whether our tongue shall be purified by the fire of the Holy Ghost, or defiled by that of Gehenna. The latter word is that employed in the Gospels, as here, for 'Hell,' wherever that word means, not simply a place for the dead, which is expressed in the Greek by 'Hades,' the unseen world, but the place of torment. (Comp. Matt. 5. 22; Mark 9. 43)"—C. B. (Prov. 16. 27; Matt. 5. 11, 18–20; Mark 7. 15, 20, 23.)

7. Every kind. "The expression perhaps is not to be taken strictly. Reptiles—that is, creeping things"—WESLEY.

8. But no man can tame the tongue—"of another; no, nor his own, without peculiar help from God"—WESLEY.

An unruly evil (R.V. "A restless evil")—"an untamable, venomous beast. It can be checked, can be disciplined, but it can never be tamed, and must never be trusted"—E. But, as Mr. Wesley's Note suggests, "With God all things are possible." (Ps. 140. 3.)

9. Men made after the likeness of God. "Indeed we have now lost this likeness; yet there remains from thence an indelible nobleness, which we ought to reverence both in ourselves and others"—WESLEY.

Which are made—"not which were once made, but which were and are made after the likeness of God, as exercising dominion over this lower world, and as capable of being reconstituted in the moral qualities of the Creator"—W. W. (Gen. 1. 26; 5. 1; 9. 6.)

10. Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. "General as the words are, they pointed, we may believe, especially to the feeling of Jews towards Christians, or of the more bigoted section of Jewish Christians towards the Gentiles. Such men were loud in their benedictions of the Eternal, the Blessed One, yet they had not learned to reverence humanity as such, as made after the likeness of God. They cursed those who worshipped or believed after a different manner from their own. The annals of Christendom show that the necessity for the warning has not passed away"—C. B.

11, 12. "The illustrations of the fountain and the fig tree are among the touches which, if they do not indicate one who is familiar with Palestine, at any rate agree well with the fact that the writer of the Epistle was such. Springs tainted with salt or sulphur are not rare, and it is stated that most of those on the eastern slope of the hill-country of Judea are brackish. The fig tree, the vine, and the olive were abundant throughout the whole country"—E. "We ought to maintain a consistency in our words or discourses; and if we profess religion and devotion, we should speak at all times as persons who are endeavouring to employ our tongues to the noble purposes for which the use of speech was given"—B.

Vers. 13–18. False and True Wisdom.—13. "Let him show his wisdom as well as his faith by his works; not by words only"—Wesley.

Good conversation (R.V. "Good life"). Meekness of wisdom. "This beautiful expression insinuates that true wisdom is always accompanied with meekness, or the government of the passions"—B. "The Christian grace of meekness is a good deal more than the due regulation of one's angry feelings. It includes submissiveness towards God, as well as gentleness towards men; and it exhibits itself in a special way in giving and receiving instruction, and in administering and accepting rebuke. It was, therefore, just the grace which the many would-be teachers, with their loud professions of correct faith and superior knowledge, specially needed to acquire"—E. (Gal. 6. 4; ch. 2. 18; 1. 21.)

14. If ye have bitter zeal—"true Christian zeal is only the flame of love—even in your hearts—though it went no further. Do not lie against the truth—as if such zeal could consist with heavenly wisdom"—Wesley.

Bitter jealousy and faction in your heart. Glory not (R.V.). "The word expresses a relative, not an absolute, glorying, a glorying over some one, on the ground of superior privileges"—C. B. "If ye be under the influence of an unkind, fierce, and contemptuous spirit, even while attempting, or pretending, to defend true religion, do not boast either of your exertions or your success in silencing an adversary. You have no religion, and no true wisdom; and to profess either is to lie against the truth"—C. (Rom. 13. 13; 2. 17, 23.)

15. This wisdom — "which is consistent with such zeal—is earthly—not heavenly; not from the Father of lights. Animal — not spiritual; not from the Spirit of God. Devilish —not the gift of Christ, but such as Satan breathes into the soul"—Wesley.

Earthly—"having this life only in view. Sensual — animal, having for its object the gratification of the passions and animal propensities; devilish — demoniacal, inspired by demons, and maintained in the soul by their indwelling influence"—C. Sensual. "The psychology of the New Testament generally assumes the threefold division of body, soul, and spirit, the second element answering to the emotional, animal life, and the third being that which includes reason and will, the capacity for immortality and for knowing God. Hence the adjective used here, formed by the word signifying soul, expresses man's state as left to lower impulses without the control of the Spirit"—C. B. (Ch. 1. 17; Phil. 3. 19.)

16. Confusion and every evil work. "About this time the Jews, from their intemperate zeal for the Law of Moses, raised seditions in Judea and elsewhere, which were the occasion of many crimes and much bloodshed"—B. (1 Cor. 3. 3; Gal. 5. 20.)

17. But the wisdom from above is first pure — "from all that is earthly, natural, and devilish. Then peaceable—true peace attending purity, it is quiet, inoffensive. Gentle—soft, mild, yielding, not rigid. Easy to be entreated — to be persuaded or convinced; not stubborn, sour, or morose. Full of good fruits—both in the heart and in the life, two of which are immediately specified. Without partiality — loving all, without respect of persons; embracing all good things, rejecting all evil. And without dissimulation—frank, open"—Wesley.

"The sequence is that of thought, not of time"—C. B. "The purity of the heavenly wisdom does not consist merely in victory over temptations of the flesh, but in freedom from worldly and low motives. Its aim is that truth should become known and prevail, and it condescends to no ignoble acts in prosecuting this aim. Contradiction does not ruffle it, and hostility does not provoke it to retaliate, because its motives are thoroughly disinterested and pure. Thus its peaceable and placable qualities flow out of its purity. It is first pure, then peaceable"—E. Without partiality (R.V. "Without variance"). "The word is cognate with a word used by S. James (ch. 1. 6; 2. 4); of the various possible meanings we may prefer 'without doubtfulness'"—E. (1 Cor. 2. 6, 7; Rom. 12. 9; 1 Pet. 1. 22; 2. 1; 1 John 3. 18.)

18. "And the principle productive of this righteousness is sown, like good seed, in the peace of a believer's mind, and brings forth a plentiful harvest of happiness (which is the proper 'fruit of righteousness') for them that make peace—that labour to promote this pure and holy peace among all men"—WESLEY.

For them that make peace (R.V.). "The meaning may be, they that endeavour to make peace among men (which is a fruit or work of righteousness) do thereby sow to themselves in peace; that is, they take that course which will produce to them happiness in the end"—B. "Let others reap the fruits of contentions, and all the advantages they can propose to themselves by them; but let us go on peaceably to sow the seeds of righteousness, and we may depend upon it our labour shall not be lost"—M. H. (Prov. 11. 18; Hosea 10. 12; Matt. 5. 9; Phil. 1. 11; Heb. 12. 11.)

CHAPTER IV.

Vers. 1–10. THE CAUSE AND THE CURE OF STRIFE.—1. From whence come wars and fightings—"quarrels and jars among you, quite opposite to this peace. it not from your pleasures—your desires of earthly pleasures—which war—against your souls—in your members—here is the first seat of the war. Hence proceeds the war of man with man, king with king, nation with nation"—WESLEY.

"There are places in this Epistle in which S. James seems to go beyond the precise circle of readers addressed in the opening words, and to glance at the whole Jewish nation, whether outside Palestine or not, and whether Christian or not. In any case we see that the Jews who had entered the Christian Church had brought with them that contentious spirit which was one of their national characteristics"—E. "The crimes condemned in this and the following chapter were so atrocious, and of so public a nature, that we can hardly suppose them to have been committed by any who bore the name of Christians. Wherefore, as this letter was directed to 'the twelve tribes,' it is reasonable to think that the apostle, in writing these chapters, had the unbelieving Jews, not only in the provinces, but in Judea, chiefly in his eye"—B. (Rom. 7. 23; Gal. 5. 17; 1 Pet. 2. 11.)

2. Ye kill—"in your heart, for 'he that hateth his brother is a murderer.' Ye fight and war—that is, furiously strive and contend. Ye ask not—and no marvel; for a man full of evil desire, of envy and hatred, cannot pray"—WESLEY.

"He may speak of the actual murders, which the carnal Jews, called Zealots, committed of the heathens, and even of those of their own nation who were opposed to them"—B. Ye have not because ye ask not. "This shows, says Macknight, that some of their purposes, at least, were laudable, and might have been accomplished with the blessing of God. This will not apply to the Judaising teachers in the Church, or to those who coveted riches. The declaration applies only to such of the unconverted Jews as endeavoured to bring the heathens to the knowledge and worship of the true God. If for this they had asked the blessing of God sincerely, they might have been successful in their purpose"—B.

3. "But if ye do ask, ye receive not, because ye ask amiss—that is, from a wrong motive"—WESLEY.

"His meaning is, that they prayed for success in converting the heathen, not from any regard to the glory of God or the salvation of the heathen, but from a desire to draw money from them whom they converted, to spend upon their own lusts"—M'K. "S. James plainly implies that when one has temporal needs one ought to bring them before God in prayer, only with a right purpose, and in a right spirit. Asking amiss consists not in asking for temporal things, but in seeking them for a wrong purpose, viz. that they may be squandered in self-indulgence"—E. (Job 27. 9; 35. 12; Ps. 18. 41; Prov. 1. 28; Isa. 1. 15; Jer. 11. 11; Micah 3. 4; Zech. 7. 13; Ps. 66. 18; 1 John 3. 22; 5. 14.)

4. Ye adulterers and adulteresses—"who have broken your faith with God, your rightful spouse. Know ye not that the friendship or love of the world—the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eye, and the pride of life, or courting the favour of worldly men, is enmity against God? Whosoever desireth to be a friend of the world—whosoever seeks either the happiness or favour of it, does thereby constitute himself an enemy of God; and can he expect to obtain anything of Him?"—WESLEY.

R.V., following the better MSS., gives ye adulteresses only. "The use of the feminine alone in this connection is at first startling, considering that the persons primarily intended are men. It finds its best interpretation in the thought that the soul's unfaithfulness to God is like that of a wife towards her husband. It is as though he said, 'Ye adulterous souls.' There is, perhaps, a touch of indignant scorn in the use of such a term"—C. B. Maketh himself an enemy of God (R.V.). "Whoever makes it his business to comply with and gratify worldly men, thereby constitutes himself an enemy of God"—B. Once more a distinct echo from the Sermon on the Mount. (Matt. 6. 24; Luke 16. 13.) "Here also, as in ch. 1. 8, stress is laid upon the fact that divided allegiance is impossible"—C. B. (Ps. 72. 27; 1 John 2. 15; John 15. 19; 17. 14; Gal. 1. 10.)

5. Do you think that the Scripture saith in vain—"without good ground. S. James seems to refer to many, not any one particular scripture. The spirit of love that dwelleth in all believers lusteth against envy (Gal. 5.

17); is directly opposite to all those unloving tempers which necessarily flow from the friendship of the world"—WESLEY.

Or think ye that the Scripture speaketh in vain? Doth the spirit which He made to dwell in us long unto envying? (R.V.). This and the following verse form a passage of known difficulty, the most difficult in this Epistle. The Greek will not bear the version "against envy"; and the reading adopted by R.V., "which He made to dwell in us," is almost certainly correct. Two expositions have been suggested: (1) Think ye that the Scripture speaks empty words? Does it mean nothing when it condemns spiritual adultery? (Lev. 20. 2-7; 2 Chron. 19. 2; Ps. 139. 21, 22; Ezek. 14. 1-8.) Does the Holy Spirit given to believers manifest His presence by those covetous, envious, rapacious desires after earthly enjoyments and possessions? On the other hand, God increases grace. (John 1. 16.) He is not willing you should go on to sin; He imparts grace to resist it, "wherefore He saith," etc. Or (2) Think ye that in vain the Scripture saith, Vehemently even to envy doth the Spirit desire us, yea, He increases to us grace according to our need, wherefore the Scripture saith, etc. This introduces us into the same figurative realm of thought in which the bold apostrophe, "ye adulteresses," placed us before. The apostle speaks of the eager and jealous love of God towards those whom He has united, as it were, in the bond of marriage with Himself. Of the two expositions the former apparently commended itself to the Revisers, as they show by rendering the second clause of the verse as an interrogation; the latter is preferred by Alford, as well as by C. B., E., W. W., and others. (Gen. 6. 5; 8. 21; Num. 11. 29; Prov. 21. 10.)

6. But He giveth greater grace—"to all who shun those tempers. Therefore it—the Scripture—saith, God resisteth the proud—and pride is the great root of all unkind affections"—WESLEY.

"God loves us with a love analogous to the strongest form of jealousy, but that jealousy does not lead Him to be grudging in His gifts; the point of the quotation which follows lies in the last clause, as containing the proof that God gives His grace freely to those who feel themselves unworthy of it"—C. B. (Job 22. 29; Ps. 138. 6; Prov. 3. 34; 29. 23; Matt. 23. 12; Luke 1. 52; 14. 11; 18. 14; 1 Pet. 5. 5.)

7. "Therefore, by humbly submitting yourselves to God, resist the devil, the father of pride and envy"—WESLEY.

"Submission to God is the beginning, middle, and end of the prodigal's return from disastrous familiarity with the world to the security of the Father's home. 'I am no more worthy to be called Thy son; make me as one of Thy hired servants.' As soon as the resolve to make this first act of submission is formed, the turning-point between friendship with the world and fidelity to God has been passed. Those who unflinchingly take that homeward path are sure of a welcome at the end of it. But the return must be complete. S. James enters an earnest protest against the weak plea that temptations are irresistible. Every Christian is endowed with sufficient power to withstand Satan, if only the will to withstand is present, because he has the power to summon God to his assistance. Resist the devil and he will flee from you—that is one side of the blessed truth; and the other is its correlative, draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you"—E. (Eph. 4. 27; 6. 11; 1 Pet. 5. 9.)

8. "Then draw nigh to God in prayer, and He will draw nigh unto you, will hear you; which that nothing may hinder, cleanse your hands—cease from doing evil—and purify your hearts—from all spiritual adultery. Be no more double-minded, vainly endeavouring to serve both God and mammon"—WESLEY.

"The nearness to God, to which the promise is annexed, is primarily that of true and earnest prayer, but it must not be forgotten that it includes also the approximation of character and life"—C. B. "The converse of this is true also, and it is a fact of equal solemnity and great awfulness. Resist GOD, and He will depart from you; draw nigh to the devil, and he will draw nigh to you"—E. (2 Chron. 15. 2; Isa. 1. 16; 1 Pet. 1. 22; 1 John 3. 3; ch. 1. 8.)

9. Be afflicted—"for your past unfaithfulness to God"—WESLEY.

Mourn and weep. "The words are an emphatic call to repentance, and to the blessedness which follows. Here, as so often in the Epistle, we trace the direct influence of the Sermon on the Mount"—C. B. (Matt. 5, 4.)

10. Humble yourselves. "Again we recognise our Lord's words as recorded in Matt. 23. 12; Luke 14. 12; 18. 14. We have also a striking parallel with S. Peter's language (1 Pet. 5. 6). There is, however, a difference. While the other passages speak mainly of humility in its relation to man, this dwells emphatically on its being manifested in relation to God"—C. B. (Job 22. 29.)

Vers. 11-17. FURTHER CAUTIONS AGAINST SINS OF SPEECH.—11. Speak not evil one of another. "This is a grand hindrance of peace. Oh, who is sufficiently aware of it! He that speaketh evil of another does in effect speak evil of the Law, which so strongly prohibits it. Thou art not a doer of the Law, but a judge—of it; thou settest thyself above, and as it were condemnest, it"—WESLEY.

"The Law condemns all evil-speaking and detraction. He who is guilty of these, and allows himself in these vices, in effect judges and condemns the Law, considers it unworthy to be kept, and that it is no sin to break it"—C.

(Eph. 4. 31 ; 1 Pet. 2. 1 ; Matt. 7. 1 ; Luke 6. 37 ; Rom. 2. 1 ; 1 Cor. 4. 5.)

12. There is one Lawgiver that is able—"to execute the sentence He denounces. But who art thou—a poor, weak, dying worm"—WESLEY.

One only is the Lawgiver and Judge, even He that is able, etc. (R.V.)—"who has power to execute His behests, whose might proves His right"—W. W. Who art thou ? "To be constantly speculating, to be frequently deciding, as to whether this man is 'awakened' or not, whether he is 'converted' or not, whether he is a 'Catholic' or not, whether he is a 'sound churchman' or not,—what is this but to climb up into the White Throne, and with human ignorance and prejudice anticipate the judgments of Divine omniscience and justice"—E. (Matt. 10. 28 ; Rom. 14. 4, 13.)

13. Come now, ye that say — "as peremptorily as if your life were in your own hands"—WESLEY.

"The warnings pass on to another form of the worldliness of the double-minded : the far-reaching plans for the future, such as our Lord condemned in the parable of the rich fool (Luke 12. 16)"—C. B.

14. What is your life ? It is even as a vapour. Similar comparisons are found in all literature. (See Job 7. 7 ; Ps. 102. 3.) "It was not strange that those who thought only of this littleness should deem that their wisdom lay in making the most of that little, in and by itself, and take 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die' (1. Cor. 15. 32) as their law of life. S. James had been taught to connect man's life with a Will higher than his own, and so to take the measure of its greatness as well as its littleness"—C. B. (Prov. 27. 1 ; ch. 1. 10 ; 1 Pet. 1. 24 ; 1 John 2. 17.)

15. Instead of your saying—"that is, whereas ye ought to say"—WESLEY.

If the Lord will. Of course it is not meant that the words should be always used, but that the sentiment expressed in them should be always present. At the same time it is interesting to note that S. Paul uses the words in 1 Cor. 4. 19. (Acts 18. 21 ; 1 Cor. 16. 7 ; Heb. 6. 3.)

16. Ye rejoice in your boastings. The carnal self-confidence with which people serenely announce their purposes in the distant future is another indication of worldliness, and is, therefore, morally evil. (1 Cor. 5. 6.)

17. Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not—"that knows what is right and does not practise it—to him it is sin—his knowledge does not prevent, but increase, his condemnation"—WESLEY.

"In the Annual Covenant Service of the Methodist Church I engage, by the Divine help, (1) 'Not to allow myself in any known sin,' (2) 'Not to allow myself in the neglect of anything that I know to be my duty.'" "Many persons imagine that an opportunity of doing good is a thing about which they have full right of choice. S. James teaches us that we are bound to make use of the opportunity"—E. (Luke 12. 47 ; John 9. 41 ; 15. 22 ; Rom. 1. 20, 21, 32 ; 2. 17, 18, 23.)

CHAPTER V.

Vers. 1–6. WARNINGS FOR THE RICH OPPRESSORS.—1. Come now, ye rich. "The apostle does not speak this so much for the sake of the rich themselves, as of the poor children of God, who were then groaning under their cruel oppression. Weep and howl for your miseries which are coming upon you—quickly and unexpectedly. This was written not long before the siege of Jerusalem ; during which, as well as after it, huge calamities came on the Jewish nation, not only in Judea, but through distant countries. And as these were an awful prelude of that wrath which was to fall upon them in the world to come, so this may likewise refer to the final vengeance which will then be executed on the impenitent"—WESLEY.

"The unbelieving Jews, being exceedingly addicted to sensual pleasure, and very covetous, were of course grievous oppressors of the poor. To alarm these wicked men, and if possible to bring them to repentance, S. James sets before them, in lively colours, the miseries which the Romans, the instruments of Divine vengeance, were about to bring upon the Jewish people. So that, being soon to lose their possessions and goods, it was not only criminal, but foolish, by injustice and oppression, to amass wealth, of which they were soon to be stripped"—B. The words are nearly the same as in ch. 4. 9, but there is in them less of the call to repentance, and more of the ring of prophetic denunciation. (Prov. 11. 28 ; Luke 6. 24 ; 1 Tim. 6. 9.)

2. "The riches of the ancients consisted much in large stores of corn, and of costly apparel"—WESLEY.

The union of the two chief forms of Eastern wealth, in this and the following verse, reminds us of the like combination in Matt. 6. 19, "Where moth and rust doth corrupt." Comp. S. Paul's, "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel." (Acts 20. 33 ; Job 13. 28 ; ch. 2. 2.)

3. The canker of them—"your perishing stores and moth eaten garments—will be a testimony against you — of your having buried those talents in the earth, instead of improving them according to your Lord's will. And will eat your flesh as fire—will occasion you as great torment as if fire were consuming your flesh. Ye have laid up treasure in the last days—when it is too late ; when you have no time to enjoy them"—WESLEY.

"This was punctually fulfilled in the destruction of that nation by their own seditions, and their wars with the Romans. For, amongst the Sicarii and the Zealots, the ringleaders of their seditions, it was crime enough to be rich. Their insatiable avarice led them continually to search into the houses of the rich, and by false accusation to slay them as deserters, for the sake of their property. Afterwards, both their substance and their bodies were devoured by the flames which consumed the city and Temple, and if anything remained it became the spoil of the Roman soldiers"—B. For the last days (R.V.). "In the last days," as WESLEY. (Rom. 2. 5.)

4. The hire of your labourers crieth. "Those sins chiefly cry to God, concerning which human laws are silent. Such are luxury, unchastity, and various forms of injustice. 'The labourers' themselves also cry to God, who is just coming to avenge their cause. Of Sabaoth—of hosts, or armies"—WESLEY.

"The evil was one of old standing in Judea. The law condemned those who kept back the wages of the hired labourer for a single night. (Lev. 19. 13; see also Jer. 22. 13, and Mal. 3. 5.) The grasping avarice which characterised the latter days of Juadism showed itself in this form of oppression among others"—C. B. Sabaoth. S. James uses the Hebrew form of the title, as being familiar to the Jews. (Job 24. 10, 11; Deut. 24. 15.)

5. Ye have cherished your hearts—"have indulged yourselves to the uttermost—as in a day of sacrifice—which were solemn feast days among the Jews"—WESLEY.

"In a day of slaughter, omitting as (R.V.). It is possible that 'in a day of slaughter' here balances 'in the last days' just above"—E. (Job 21. 13; Amos 6. 1; Luke 16. 19, 25; 1 Tim. 5. 6.)

6. Ye have killed the just. "Many just men; in particular, that 'Just One' (Acts 3. 14). They afterwards killed S. James, surnamed the Just, the writer of this Epistle. He doth not resist you—and therefore you are secure. But the Lord cometh quickly"—WESLEY.

Mr. Wesley uses "secure" in its original meaning, "free from care." "Secure, insensible." The just (R.V. "The Righteous One"). The words have been very generally understood as referring to the death of Christ; and it is not impossible that such an allusion may have been in the mind of the writer. But he speaks in general terms, and describes the conduct of the rich and powerful Jews towards good, probably Christian, men. Such men do not resist, but submit patiently, knowing that in the end they will be more than conquerors. C. B. points out the change of tense, He doth not, intimating a general principle of conduct. (Ch. 2. 6.)

Vers. 7-20. COMFORT AND COUNSELS FOR THE FAITHFUL.—7. Be patient, therefore, brethren. He now addresses the pious, oppressed, and persecuted disciples of Christ; as if he had said, Since the Lord will soon come to punish them, and to relieve you, patiently bear the injuries which rich men offer you, and quietly wait till He come. The husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit—"which will recompense his labour and patience—till he receives the former rain—immediately after sowing. And the latter—before the harvest"—WESLEY.

In Judea the rains usually came in a regular manner, the early rain about the beginning of November, after the seed was sown; and the latter in the middle, or towards the end of April, when the ears were filling. The employment of such an allusion shows that the writer was resident in Palestine. (Deut. 11. 14; Jer. 5. 24; Hosea 6. 3; Joel 2. 23; Zech. 10. 1.)

8. Stablish your hearts—"in faith and patience—for the coming of the Lord—to destroy Jerusalem—is nigh—and so is His last coming to the eye of a believer"—WESLEY.

"S. James evidently shared the belief, which prevailed in the apostolic age, that Jesus Christ would very speedily return in glory to punish the wicked and reward the righteous"—E. "Here we note a hope that was not fulfilled as men expected its fulfilment, and yet was not frustrated"—C. B. (Phil. 4. 5; Heb. 10. 25, 37; 1 Pet. 4. 7.)

9. Murmur not one against another—"have patience also with each other—the Judge standeth before the door—hearing every word, marking every thought"—WESLEY.

One against another. "It is the common experience that men who are exasperated by trying persons or circumstances are liable to vent their vexation on those who are in no way responsible for what tries them. S. James says, 'Do not let the smart of your troubles betray you into impatience one towards another. He who is to judge your oppressors will judge you also, and He is close at hand'"—E. (Ch. 4. 11; Matt. 24. 33; 1 Cor. 4. 5.)

10. Take the prophets for an example—"once persecuted like you, even for speaking in the name of the Lord. The very men that gloried in having prophets yet could not bear their message; nor did either their holiness or their high commission screen them from suffering"—WESLEY.

By the prophets S. James, no doubt, means the prophets of the Old Testament—Elijah, Jeremiah, and others. Here again, and in the following verse, we have an echo of the Sermon on the Mount. (Matt. 5. 12; Heb. 11. 35.)

11. We count them happy that endured—"that suffered patiently. The more they suffered, the greater is their present happiness. Ye have seen the end of the Lord—the end which the Lord gave him"—WESLEY.

The patience of Job—better, "endurance," as R.V. margin, to keep up the connection with the verb. Though the Book of Job is quoted once (1 Cor. 3. 19), this is the only New Testament reference to the history. That the Lord is very pitiful—"that it is with the tenderness of an affectionate father that He corrects His children, 'not for His pleasure, but for our profit'"—B. (Ps. 94. 12; Matt. 5. 10, 11; 10. 22; Job 1. 21, 22; 2. 10; 42. 10; Num. 14. 18; Ps. 103. 8.)

12. Swear not—"however provoked. The Jews were notoriously guilty of common swearing, though not so much by God Himself as by some of His creatures. The apostle here particularly forbids these oaths, as well as all swearing in common conversation. It is very observable, how solemnly the apostle introduces this command—above all things, swear not. As if he had said, Whatever you forget, do not forget this. This abundantly demonstrates the horrible iniquity of the crime. But he does not forbid the taking a solemn oath before a magistrate. Let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay—use no higher asseverations in common discourse; and let your word stand firm. Whatever ye say, take care to make it good"—WESLEY.

"The passage presents so close a parallel with Matt. 5. 33–37 that it is almost a necessary inference that S. James, if not a hearer of the Sermon on the Mount, had become acquainted with it as reported by others. That the condemnation does not extend to the solemn judicial use of oaths we see in the facts—(1) that our Lord answered when questioned as on oath by Caiaphas (Matt. 26. 63, 64), and (2) that S. Paul at times used modes of expression which are of the nature of an oath. (2 Cor. 1. 23; Rom. 1. 9; Gal. 1. 20; Phil. 1. 8)"—C. B.

13. Is any among you afflicted? "Let the expression of strongly excited feelings be an act of worship; then we shall have an outlet for them which is not likely to involve us in harmful results. This practice also secures a real connection between worship and life"—E. "It is characteristic of S. James that he contemplates the individual use of music as well as the congregational, as a help to the spiritual life. We are reminded of two memorable instances of this employment in the lives of George Herbert and Milton"—C. B. Among Methodist biographies, see Memorials of W. M. Bunting and Memoir of John Fernley. (Eph. 5. 19; Col. 3. 16.)

14. Having anointed him with oil. "This single conspicuous gift, which Christ committed to His apostles (Mark 6. 13), remained in the Church long after the other miraculous gifts were withdrawn. Indeed, it seems to have been designed to remain always; and S. James directs the elders, who were the most, if not the only, gifted men, to administer it. This was the whole process of physic in the Christian Church, till it was lost through unbelief. That novel invention among the Romanists, extreme unction, practised not for cure, but where life is despaired of, bears no manner of resemblance to this"—WESLEY.

"Anointing the sick with oil, in order to their recovery, was a constant practice among the Jews. And here I am satisfied that it has no other meaning than as a natural means of restoring health, and that S. James desires them to use natural means while looking to God for an especial blessing"—C. "The principle implied in the use of the oil was probably, in part, analogous to our Lord's employment of like media in the case of the blind and deaf. (Mark 7. 33; 8. 23; John 9. 6.) It served as a help to the faith of the person healed; perhaps also, in the case of the apostles, to that of the healer"—C. B. (Mark 6. 13; 16. 18.)

15. "And the prayer offered in faith shall save the sick—from his sickness; and if any sin be the occasion of his sickness, it shall be forgiven him"—WESLEY.

"That S. James makes the promise of recovery, without any restriction, may at first sight appear surprising; but he is only following the example of our Lord, who makes similar promises, and leaves it to the thought and experience of Christians to find out the limitations to them. He is applying to a particular case what Christ promised in general terms, 'All things, whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe that ye have received them, and ye shall have them.' (Mark 11. 24.) The union of our will with the will of God is the very first condition of successful prayer. The apostles themselves had no indiscriminate power of healing. S. Paul did not heal Epaphroditus, much as he yearned for his recovery. (Phil. 2. 27.) He left Trophimus at Miletus sick. (2 Tim. 4. 20.) He did not cure his own thorn in the flesh. (2 Cor. 12. 7–9.) How then can we suppose that S. James credited the elders of every congregation with an unrestricted power of healing. He leaves it to the common sense and Christian submission of his readers to understand that the elders have no power to cancel the sentence of death passed upon the whole human race"—E. (Isa. 33. 24; Matt. 9. 2.)

16. Confess your faults—"whether ye are sick or in health—to one another. He does not say to the elders: this may, or may not, be done; for it is nowhere commanded. We may confess them to any who can pray in faith: he will then know how to pray for us, and be more stirred up so to do. And pray one for another, that ye may be healed—of all your spiritual diseases"—WESLEY.

"In details the precept is singularly wide. The confession is not to be made by the layman to the elder, more than by the elder to the layman. Whether it was to be public or private, spontaneous or carried on by questions, is left open. Examples such as those of Matt. 3. 6; Acts 19. 18, 19, suggest the thought of the public confession of individual sins, which was, indeed, the practice of the Church of the third and fourth centuries"—C. B. Dr. Plumptre is misinformed when he adds, "A late revival of the custom (public confession of individual sins) is found in the 'class meetings' of the followers of John Wesley.' Such a practice was never known, either as a rule or an usage, in the Methodist Church. The effectual fervent prayer (R.V. "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working"). "Macknight renders, 'the inward prayer'; Doddridge, 'the prayer wrought by the energy of the Spirit'; and Whitby, 'the inspired prayer,' observing, 'As they who were inwardly acted upon by an evil spirit were styled energumeni, persons inwardly wrought upon, so they that were acted upon by the Holy Spirit, and inwardly moved by His impulses, were also energumeni, in the good sense'"—B. "Great is the strength of a righteous man's supplication in its earnestness"—E. (Gen. 20. 17; Num. 11. 2; Deut. 9. 18-20; Josh. 10. 12; 1 Sam. 12. 18; 1 Kings 13. 6; 2 Kings 4. 33; 19. 15, 20; 20. 2, 4; Ps. 10. 17; 34. 15; 145. 18; Prov. 15. 29; 28. 9; John 9. 31; 1 John 3. 22.)

17. Elijah was a man of like passions—"naturally as weak and sinful as we are. And he prayed—when idolatry covered the land"—WESLEY. (Acts 14. 15; 1 Kings 17. 1; Luke 4. 25.)

18. He prayed again—"when idolatry was abolished"—WESLEY.

"This passage supplies us with biblical authority for prayers, for changes of weather, and the like. S. James guards against the objection that Elijah was a man gifted with miraculous powers, and therefore no guide for ordinary people, by asserting that he was a man of like nature with ourselves"—E. (1 Kings 18. 42, 45.)

19. "As if he had said, I have now warned you of those sins to which you are most liable; and in all these respects watch not only over yourselves, but everyone over his brother also. Labour, in particular, to recover those that are fallen. If any one err from the truth—practically by sin"—WESLEY.

"There is something fatally wrong about us if we have no strong desire to bring back sinners to God. The surest road to personal happiness is to devote oneself to promoting the happiness of others, and the best way to secure one's own salvation is to devote oneself to helping forward the salvation of others"—E. (Matt. 18. 15.)

20. He shall save a soul—"of how much more value than the body! (Ver. 14.) And hide a multitude of sins—which shall no more, how many soever they are, be remembered to his condemnation"—WESLEY.

"Namely, the sins of the person thus converted. The covering of sin is a phrase which often occurs in the Old Testament, and always signifies the pardon of sins. It cannot be the apostle's intention to tell us that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way will conceal from the eye of God's justice a multitude of sins committed by the person who does this charitable office, if he continueth in them. Such a person needs himself to be turned from the error of his way, that his own soul may be saved from death"—B. "The absence of any formal close to the Epistle is in many ways remarkable. A possible explanation is, that we have lost the conclusion. It is, however, more probable that the abruptness is that of emphasis. The writer had given utterance to a truth which he desired above all things to impress on the minds of his readers, and he could not do this more effectually than by making it the last word he wrote to them"—C. B. (Rom. 11. 14; 1 Cor. 9. 22; 1 Tim. 4. 16; Prov. 10. 12; 1 Pet. 4. 8.)

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

THE Apostle Peter, originally named Simon, was a native of Northern Palestine, and was employed, during the earlier portion of his life, as a fisherman upon the little Sea of Galilee. He was one of the first to accept the call of the Lord Jesus at the commencement of His public ministry, and for some reason, not very clearly indicated, he appears from the outset to have held the foremost place among the apostles. In force of character, and in enthusiastic attachment to his Master's person, he had no rival among his brethren. In the Gospel narratives it is to him that Jesus speaks as the representative of the rest, and on some very solemn occasions he addresses Jesus in their name. He was one of the three who were selected to attend the Master when even the other apostles were excluded, at the raising of Jairus' daughter, at the Transfiguration, and in the Garden of Gethsemane; and he is always mentioned first among the three.

From the Acts of the Apostles, and from the Epistles, it is clear that he retained for a time the ascendency among his brethren which he had enjoyed as a follower of Jesus. He had the honour of commencing the great task assigned to the apostles and to the witnessing Church. He preached the first gospel sermon on the day of Pentecost, the birthday of the dispensation of the Spirit; he performed, in conjunction with S. John, the first Christian miracle, and was distinguished, with the same companion, as being the first to suffer imprisonment for Christ's sake. When the Gentiles began to receive the new faith, we learn from S. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians that S. Peter accepted the Gospel of the Circumcision as his peculiar charge, and that his ministry was addressed chiefly, though not exclusively, to the people of his own race. It must not be supposed, however, that such a ministry would be merely local, limited to the narrow bounds of Palestine. Then, as now, the Jewish race was widely scattered, and in every centre of commerce or civilisation large communities of them were to be found. S. Peter's First Epistle is dated from Babylon, beyond the eastern frontier of the empire; we read of him at Antioch and at Corinth, and a very ancient and uncontradicted tradition asserts that he suffered martyrdom at Rome. Probably S. Paul himself did not labour over a wider area.

It is perhaps owing to the lack of early culture, and of perfect mastery over the Greek language, which was then the common dialect of the civilised world, that we have so little from the pen of this distinguished leader of the primitive Church. The Gospel according to S. Mark is understood to have been written under his direction; and the tradition to that effect is corroborated by a fact to which the eloquent S. Chrysostom first drew attention, that S. Mark's Gospel brings out every defect and failing in S. Peter's character, while many noble acts and many marks of peculiar favour are either omitted, or stated with far less force than by any other Evangelist.

The Epistle before us, however, is evidently dictated, if not written, by the apostle himself. In purity of diction it may owe something to the influence of Silvanus, who was present when it was written, and who conveyed it to its destination. It was addressed to the Hebrew Christians of the churches of Asia Minor, which had been chiefly founded by S. Paul and his companions, among whom Silvanus, or Silas, had been conspicuous. Its objects were—(1) To comfort and strengthen them in a season of severe ial; (2) To enforce the practical and spiritual duties involved in their Christian profession; (3) To warn them against special temptations; (4) To remove all doubt as to the soundness and completeness of the religious system which they had already received. Such an attestation, on S. Peter's authority, was especially needed by the Hebrew Christians. The last, which is perhaps the principal object, is kept in view throughout the Epistle, and is distinctly stated. (Ch. 5. 12.)

The study of this Epistle, the genuineness of which is unquestioned, will lead the candid reader to the following conclusions:—(1) That S. Peter, at the time at which it was written, did not claim, or exercise, anything approaching primacy in the Christian Church; (2) That the idea of an antagonism between S. Peter and S. Paul, in which some historical critics have found the secret of the development of the Apostolic Church, is singularly at variance with facts.

"THE PARTS OF THIS EPISTLE ARE THREE—

I. The Inscription, ... Chap. i. 1, 2.

II. The stirring up of those to whom he writes—

1. As born of God. Here he recites and interweaves alternately, both the benefits of God toward believers, and the duties of believers toward God, . . Chaps. i. 3—ii. 10.

2. As strangers in the world, abstain from fleshly desires, and show your faith by (a) a good conversation, (b) a good profession, ... ,, ii. 11—iv. 11.

3. As fellow-heirs of glory sustain adversity, . . Chaps. iv. 12—v. 11.
[The title beloved divides the second part from the first (ii. 11), and the third part from the second (iv. 12).]

III. The Conclusion, ... Chap. v. 12–14."
—WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

Vers. 1, 2. THE SALUTATION.—1. To the sojourners—"upon earth, the Christians, chiefly those of Jewish extraction. Scattered—long ago driven out of their own land. Those scattered by the persecution, mentioned Acts 8. 1, were scattered only through Judea and Samaria, though afterwards some of them travelled to Phenice, Cyprus, and Antioch. Through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. He names these five provinces in the order wherein they occurred to him, writing from the East. All these countries lie in the Lesser Asia. The Asia here distinguished from the other provinces is that which was usually called the proconsular Asia, being a Roman province"—WESLEY.

To the elect, who are sojourners of the dispersion in Pontus, etc. (R.V.). The expression, the dispersion, was in general use to indicate the Jews who dwelt in foreign countries. Here it is evidently applied to the Hebrew Christians, to whom the Epistle is specially, though not exclusively, addressed. (John 7. 35; Acts 2. 5, 9, 10; Jas. 1. 1.)

2. Elect—"called out of the world, and from a state of ignorance and sin, guilt and depravity, weakness and wretchedness, by the Word, the Spirit, and the Providence of God; and in consequence of obeying that call, by turning to God in true repentance, living faith, and new obedience, chosen, or accepted of God. For all true believers, or genuine Christians, have continually the title of 'God's elect' in the New Testament"—B.

According to the foreknowledge of God—"speaking after the manner of men. Strictly speaking, there is no foreknowledge, no more than afterknowledge, with God; but all things are known to Him as present from eternity to eternity. This is, therefore, no other than an instance of the Divine condescension to our low capacities. Elect—by the free love and almighty power of God, taken out of, separated from, the world. Election, in the Scripture sense, is God's doing anything that our merit or power has no part in. The true predestination, or foreappointment of God is—(1) He that believeth shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin; (2) He that endureth to the end shall be saved eternally; (3) They who receive the precious gift of faith, thereby become the sons of God; and, being sons, they shall receive the Spirit of holiness to walk as Christ also walked. Throughout every part of this appointment of God, promise and duty go hand in hand. All is free gift; and yet such is the gift that the final issue depends on our future obedience to the heavenly call. But other predestination than this, either to life or death eternal, the Scripture knows not of. Moreover, it is—(1) Cruel respect of persons; an unjust regard of one, and an unjust disregard of another. It is mere creature partiality, and not infinite justice; (2) It is not plain Scripture doctrine, if true; but rather, inconsistent with the express written word, that speaks of God's universal offers of grace; His invitations, promises, threatenings, being all general; (3) We are bid to choose life, and reprehended for not doing it; (4) It is inconsistent with a state of probation in those that must be saved or must be lost; (5) It is of fatal consequence—all men being ready, on very slight grounds, to fancy themselves of the elect number. But the doctrine of predestination is entirely changed from what it formerly was. Now it implies neither faith, peace, nor purity. It is something that will do without them all. Faith is no longer, according to the modern predestinarian scheme, a Divine 'evidence of things not seen,' wrought in the soul by the immediate power of the Holy Ghost; not an evidence at all; but a mere notion. Neither is faith made any longer a means of holiness, but something that will do without it. Christ is no more a Saviour from sin, but a defence, a countenancer of it. He is no more a fountain of spiritual life in the soul of believers, but leaves His elect inwardly dry, and outwardly unfruitful, and is made little more than a refuge from the image of the heavenly; even from righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Through sanctification of the Spirit—through the renewing and purifying influences of His Spirit on their souls—unto obedience—to engage and enable them to yield themselves up to all holy obedience, the foundation of all which is, the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ—the atoning blood of Christ, which was typified by the sprinkling of the blood of sacrifices under the Law; in allusion to which it is called 'the blood of sprinkling'"—WESLEY.

The painful controversy which gave rise to Mr. Wesley's long and able Note no longer disturbs the peace of the churches. It is evident that the words elect according to foreknowledge present no difficulty in themselves; but to reconcile the absolute foreknowledge of God with the absolute freedom and responsibility of man is a problem perhaps insoluble to the human intellect. Both are true, according to the Scripture, and doubtless God can reconcile them, if we cannot. Grace and peace. "Solid peace cannot be enjoyed where there is no grace; first grace, then peace; peace without grace is mere stupidity; but grace may be true, where there is for a time no actual peace; as Heman was distracted with terror, and Christ was once in an agony"—M. H. (Eph. 1. 4; ch. 2. 9; Rom. 8. 29; 11. 2; 2 Thess. 2. 13; Heb. 10. 22; 12. 24; Rom. 1. 7; 2 Pet. 1. 2; Jude 2.)

Vers. 3–12. CONGRATULATION.—3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. "His Father, with respect to His Divine nature; His God, with respect to His human. Who hath regenerated us to a living hope—a hope which implies true spiritual life, which revives the heart, and makes the soul lively and vigorous—by the resurrection of Christ—which is not only a pledge of ours, but a part of the purchase-price. It has also a close connection with our rising from spiritual death, that, as He liveth, so shall we live with Him. He was acknowledged to be the Christ, but usually called Jesus till His resurrection; then he was also called Christ"—WESLEY.

"They that are begotten to a new and spiritual life are begotten to a new and spiritual hope"—M. H. "It is noticeable that S. Peter, who elsewhere (ch. 3. 21) lays so much stress on baptism, does not here refer to it as the instrument of the new birth"—C. B. (2 Cor. 1. 3; Eph. 1. 3; Tit. 3. 5; John 3. 3-5; James 1. 18; 1 Cor. 15. 20; 1 Thess. 4. 14; ch. 3. 21.)

4. To an inheritance—"for if we are sons, then heirs—incorruptible—not like earthly treasures—undefiled—pure and holy, incapable of being itself defiled, or of being enjoyed by any polluted soul. And that fadeth not away—that never decays in its value, sweetness, or beauty, like all the enjoyments of this world, like the garlands of leaves or flowers, with which the ancient conquerors were wont to be crowned. Reserved in heaven for you—who 'by patient continuance in welldoing, seek for glory and honour and immortality'"—WESLEY.

The epithets distinguish this from any earthly inheritance, such as had been given to Israel (Acts 7. 5), and agree with the "everlasting inheritance" of Heb. 9. 15. (Ch. 5. 4; Col. 1. 5; 2 Tim. 4. 8.)

5. Who are kept—"the inheritance is reserved; the heirs are kept for it—by the power of God—which worketh all in all, which guards us against all our enemies—through faith—through which alone salvation is both received and retained—ready to be revealed—that revelation is made in the last day. It was more and more ready to be revealed, ever since Christ came"—WESLEY.

"In the word kept we have, as in 2 Cor. 11-32 in its literal, and Phil. 4. 7 in its figurative sense, the idea of being 'guarded,' as men are guarded in a camp or citadel"—C. B. "The preservation by God's power does not supersede man's care and endeavour for his own salvation; here is God's power, and man's faith, which implies an earnest desire of salvation, a reliance upon Christ, according to His invitations and promises, a vigilant care to do everything pleasing to God, and avoid whatever is offensive, an abhorrence of temptations, a respect to the recompense of reward, and persevering diligence in prayer; by such a patient, operating, conquering faith we are kept, under the assistance of Divine grace, unto salvation"—M. H. "The word salvation is used here in its highest sense, as including the full consummation of blessedness"—C. B. (John 10. 28, 29; 17. 11, 12-15; Jude 1.)

6. Wherein—"that is, in being so kept—ye even now greatly rejoice, though now for a little while—such is our whole life, compared to eternity. If need be—for it is not always needful. If God sees it to be the best means for your spiritual profit. Ye are in heaviness—or sorrow; but not in darkness; for they still retained both faith (ver. 5), hope, and love; yea, at this very time were rejoicing with joy unspeakable (ver. 8)"—WESLEY.

Greatly rejoice. "The two English words answer to one in the original, which expresses, as in Matt. 5. 12; Luke 1. 47; 10. 21, the act of an exulting joy. It may fairly be regarded as an echo of our Lord's teaching on the Mount"—C. B. Manifold temptations. "All kinds of adversities are temptations, or trials of faith, patience, and constancy; these seldom go single, but are manifold, and come from different quarters; the effect of all which is great heaviness"—M. H. (Matt. 5. 12; Rom. 12. 12; 2 Cor. 6. 10; ch. 4. 13; 2 Cor. 4. 17; ch. 5. 10; James 1. 2.)

7. That the trial of your faith—"that is, your faith which is tried—which is much more precious than gold—for gold, though it bear the fire, yet will perish with the world—may be found—though it doth not yet appear—unto praise—from God Himself—and honour—from men and angels—and glory—assigned by the great Judge"—WESLEY.

"The trial of faith is more precious than the trial of gold; in both there is a purification, a separation of the dross, and a discovery of the soundness and goodness of the things tried. Gold does not increase and multiply by trials in the fire; it rather grows less; but faith is established, improved, and multiplied by the opposition and afflictions that it meets with. Gold must perish at the last, but faith never will"—M. H. (James 1. 3-12; ch. 4. 12; Job 23. 10; Ps. 66. 10; Prov. 17. 3; Isa. 48. 10; Zech. 13. 9; 1 Cor. 3. 13; Rom. 2. 7-10; 1 Cor. 4. 5; 2 Thess. 1. 7-12.)

8. Having not seen — "in the flesh"—WESLEY.

S. Peter had seen, and believed; but now he commends the faith and love of those who had never known Christ after the flesh. He seems to have in mind what the Lord said to Thomas, "Blessed are they who have not seen, and yet have believed." (1 John 4. 20; John 20. 29; 2 Cor. 5. 7; Heb. 11. 1-27.)

9. Receiving—"now already—salvation—from all sin into all holiness, which is the qualification for, the forerunner and pledge of, eternal salvation"—WESLEY.

The end of your faith, even the salvation. It is lawful for a man to make the salvation of his soul the end at which he aims; the glory of God, and the welfare of those around us are so connected with it, that if we earnestly seek the one object we shall certainly attain the others. (Rom. 6. 12.)

10. Of which salvation—"so far beyond all that was experienced under the Jewish dispensation. The very prophets who prophesied long ago of the grace of God toward you—of His abundant, overflowing grace to be bestowed on believers under the Christian dispensation. Inquired—were earnestly inquisitive—and searched diligently—like miners searching after precious ore, after the meaning of the prophecies which they delivered"—WESLEY. (Gen. 49. 10; Dan. 2. 44; Hagg. 2. 7; Zech. 6. 12; Matt. 13. 17; Luke 10. 24; 2 Pet. 1. 19-21.)

11. Searching what time—"what particular period—and what manner of time—by what marks to be distinguished—the glories that were to follow—His sufferings—namely, the glory of His resurrection, ascension, exaltation, and the effusion of His Spirit; the glory of the last judgment, and of His eternal kingdom; and also the glories of His grace in the hearts and lives of Christians"—WESLEY.

The Spirit of Christ—"the Holy Spirit, as a spirit of prophecy communicated to them by Christ. We learn that the inspiration of the Jewish prophets was derived from Christ"—B. Searching. "The prophets plainly saw that the grace which was to come under the Messiah's kingdom was vastly superior to anything that had ever been exhibited under the Law; and, in consequence, they made all possible inquiry, and searched as after grains of gold hidden in the sand, in order to ascertain the time, and the signs of the time, when this wondrous display of God's love and mercy to man would take place"—C. (Ch. 3. 19; 2 Pet. 1. 21; Ps. 22. 6; Isa. 53. 3, etc.; Dan. 9. 26; Luke 24. 25, 26, 44-46; John 12. 41; Acts 26. 22, 23.)

12. To whom—"so searching—it was revealed, that not for themselves, but for us they ministered—they did not so much by those predictions serve themselves, or that generation, as they did us, who now enjoy what they saw afar off. With the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven—confirmed by the inward, powerful testimony of the Holy Ghost, as well as the mighty effusion of His miraculous gifts. Which things angels desire to look into—a beautiful gradation; prophets, righteous men, kings, desired to see and hear what Christ did and taught. What the Holy Ghost taught concerning Christ the very angels long to know"—WESLEY.

There is a tacit contrast implied between the Old Testament privileges and those enjoyed under the Christian dispensation in the words with the Holy Ghost, etc. This is emphatically the dispensation of the Spirit. (Heb. 11. 13, 39, 40; Acts 2. 4; Ex. 25. 20; Dan. 8. 13; 12. 5, 6; Eph. 3. 10.)

Vers. 13-25. AN EXHORTATION.—13. Wherefore—"having such encouragement—gird up the loins of your mind—as persons in the eastern countries were wont, in travelling or running, to gird up their long garments, so gather ye up all your thoughts and affections, and keep your mind always disencumbered and prepared to run the race which is set before you. Be watchful—as servants that wait for their Lord—and hope to the end—maintain a full expectation of all the grace—the blessings flowing from the free favour of God. Which shall be brought to you at the final revelation of Jesus Christ—and which are now brought to you by the revelation of Christ in you"—WESLEY.

Be sober (A.V. and R.V.). Hope to the end (R.V. "Set your hope perfectly"). "Continue to expect all that God has promised; and especially that utmost salvation which you shall attain at the revelation of Jesus Christ, when He shall come to judge the world"—C. Be sober—"temperate and modest in eating, drinking, apparel, recreation, business, and in the whole of your behaviour; be sober-minded also in opinion as well as in practice, and humble in your judgment of yourselves"—M. H. (Luke 12. 35; Eph. 6. 14; Luke 21. 34; Rom. 13. 13; 1 Thess. 5. 6-8; ch. 4. 7; 5. 8; Luke 17. 30; 1 Cor. 1. 7; 2 Thess. 1. 7.)

14. Your desires. "Which ye had while ye were ignorant of God"—WESLEY. (Rom. 12. 2; ch. 4. 2; Acts 17. 30; 1 Thess. 4. 5.)

15. In all manner of conversation (R.V. "Of living"). "A noble rule, enforced by strong arguments. Complete holiness is the desire and duty of every Christian. Here is a twofold rule of holiness. It must, for the extent of it, be universal; in all manner of conversation, in all civil and religious affairs; in every condition, prosperous or adverse; towards all people, friends or enemies, in all our intercourse and business we must be holy. Secondly, for the pattern of it, we must be holy, as God is holy; we must imitate Him, though we cannot equal Him"—M. H. (Luke 1. 74, 75; 2 Cor. 7. 1; 1 Thess. 4. 3, 4-7; Heb. 12. 14; 2 Pet. 3. 11; Lev. 11. 44; 19. 2; 20. 7.)

17. If ye call on Him as Father (R.V.) Who judgeth according to every man's work—"according to the tenor of his life and conversation—pass the time of your sojourning—your short abode on earth—in humble, loving fear—the proper companion and guard of hope"—WESLEY.

"The fear urged upon them is not the terror of slaves, but the reverential awe of sons, even that fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom"—C. B. (Deut. 10. 17; Acts 10. 34; Rom. 2. 11; 2 Cor. 7. 1; Phil. 2. 12; Heb. 12. 28: 2 Cor. 5. 6; Heb. 11. 13; ch. 2. 11.)

18. Your vain conversation—"your foolish, sinful way of life"—WESLEY.

Received by tradition. "The Jews derived from their fathers that implicit regard for the traditions of the elders whereby they made the law of God of none effect. In like manner the Gentiles derived their idolatry and their abominable vices from the teaching and example of their fathers"—B. The design of Christ in shedding His blood was to redeem us, not only from eternal misery, but especially from the love and power of sin. Note also, that antiquity is no guarantee of correct opinions, and that we cannot safely argue that our conduct is morally right because it is sanctioned by custom and example. (1 Cor. 6. 20; 7. 23; Ezek. 20. 18; ch. 4. 3.)

19. Without blemish—"in Himself; without spot—from the world"—WESLEY. (Acts 20. 28; Eph. 1. 7; Heb. 9. 12–14; Rev. 5. 9; Ex. 12. 5; Isa. 53. 7; John 1. 29–36; 1 Cor. 5. 7.)

20. Foreordained before the foundation of the world (R.V. "Foreknown"). (Rom. 3. 25; 16. 25, 26; Eph. 3. 9, 11; Col. 1. 26; 2 Tim. 1. 9, 10; Tit. 1. 2, 3; Rev. 13. 8; Gal. 4. 4; Eph. 1. 10; Heb. 1. 2; 9. 26.)

21. Who through Him believe—"for all our faith and hope proceed from the power of His resurrection—in God that raised Jesus, and gave Him glory—at His ascension. Without Christ we should only dread God; whereas through Him we believe, hope, and love"—WESLEY.

That raised Him up from the dead—"thereby confirming His doctrine, showing the efficacy of His atonement, procuring for you the Holy Spirit, and assuring you of your resurrection"—B. Who by Him believe in God. "This indicates that S. Peter had Gentiles in his mind. They were brought to acknowledge the Father by the manifestation of the Son. To the Jews our Lord said, 'Ye believe in God; believe also in Me'"—W. W. (Acts 2. 24; Matt. 28. 18; Acts 2. 33; 3. 13; Eph. 1. 20; Phil. 2. 9; Heb. 2. 9; ch. 3. 22.)

22. "Having purified your souls by obeying the truth through the Spirit, who bestows upon you freely both obedience and purity of heart, and unfeigned love of the brethren, go on to still higher degrees of love. Love one another fervently—with the most strong and tender affection, and yet with a pure heart—pure from any spot of unholy desire or inordinate passion"—WESLEY.

"The word of God is the great instrument of a sinner's sanctification. The gospel is called the truth, in opposition to types and shadows, and to error and falsehood. This truth, if it be obeyed, is effectual to purify the soul. (John 17. 17.) And the souls of Christians must be purified before they can love one another unfeignedly. There is no charity but out of a pure heart"—M. H. (Acts 15. 9; Rom. 12. 9, 10; 1 Thess. 4. 9; 1 Tim. 1. 5; Heb. 13. 1; ch. 2. 17; 3. 8; 4. 8; 2 Pet. 1. 7; 1 John 3. 18; 4. 7, 21.)

23. Born again—"born of the Spirit, a consideration which lays you under obligation to love your brethren in Christ, who are born of the same Spirit"—B.

"The word of God—in the previous verse 'the truth'—which liveth—is full of Divine virtue—and abideth the same for ever"—WESLEY. (John 1. 13; 3. 5; James 1. 18; 1 John 3. 9.)

24. All flesh—"every human creature—is transient and withering as grass—and all the glory of it—his wisdom, strength, wealth, righteousness—as the flower—the most short-lived part of it. The grass—that is, man. The flower—that is, his glory. Is fallen off—as it were, while we are speaking"—WESLEY.

"The reader will recollect that this is a quotation from Isa. 40. 6–8, where the preaching of the gospel is foretold and recommended, from the consideration that everything that is merely human, and among the rest the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory and grandeur, their honour, riches, beauty, strength, and eloquence, all the arts which men have invented, and all the works they have executed, decay as the flowers of the field. But the incorruptible seed, the gospel, called by the prophet 'the word of the Lord,' shall be preached while the world stands; and the Divine nature, which it is the instrument of conveying to believers, will remain in them to all eternity"—B. (Ps. 103. 15; Isa. 40. 6; 51. 12; James 1. 10; Ps. 102. 12, 26; Isa. 40. 8; Luke 16. 17; John 1. 1, 14; 1 John 1. 1, 3.)

CHAPTER II.

Vers. 1–10. A NEW AND PURER LIFE.—1. Wherefore laying aside—"as inconsistent with that pure love—all dissimulation—which is the outward expression of guile in the heart" WESLEY. (Eph. 4. 22, 25, 31; Col. 3. 8; Heb. 12. 1; James 1. 21; 5. 9; ch. 4. 2.)

2. "Desire—always, as earnestly as new-born babes do (1 Pet. 1. 3)—the milk of the word—that word of God which nourishes the soul as milk does the body, and which is sincere, pure from all guile, so that none are deceived who cleave to it. That you may grow thereby—in faith, love, holiness, unto the full stature of Christ"—WESLEY.

Long for the spiritual milk which is without guile, that you may grow thereby unto salvation (R.V.). The exhortation refers to the fact that Christians are 'born again,' as described in the previous chapter. Entering the new life, they should lay aside the evil which belonged to the old, and long for the simple truth as it is in Jesus, to nourish and strengthen them." (Matt. 18. 3; Mark 10. 15; Rom. 6. 4; 1 Cor. 14. 20; ch. 1. 23; 1 Cor. 3. 2; Heb. 5. 12, 13.)

3. Since ye have tasted—"sweetly and experimentally known"—WESLEY.

"The apostle evidently alludes to Ps. 34. 8, 'O taste and see that the Lord is good.' Not only think and believe, on his own testimony, or on the testimony of others, that He is good; but know it by your own experience, know that He is good to you in pardoning your sins, adopting and regenerating you by His grace, shedding his love abroad in your hearts, and giving you to enjoy communion with himself through the Eternal Spirit"—B. (Ps. 34. 8; Heb. 6. 5.)

4. To whom coming—"by faith—as unto a living stone—living from eternity; alive from the dead. There is a wonderful beauty and energy in these expressions, which describe Christ as a spiritual foundation, solid, firm, durable; and believers as a building erected upon it, in preference to that temple which the Jews accounted their highest glory. And S. Peter, speaking of Him thus, shows he did not judge himself, but Christ, to be the Rock on which the Church was built. Rejected indeed by men—even at this day, not only by Jews, Turks, heathens, infidels, but by all Christians, so called, who live in sin, or who hope to be saved by their own works. But chosen of God—from all eternity, to be the foundation of His Church—and precious—in Himself, in the sight of God, and in the eyes of all believers"—WESLEY.

The apostle alludes to Isa. 28. 16, where the formation of a Christian Church, for the spiritual worship of God, is foretold under the image of a temple, which God was to build upon the Messiah, as the foundation stone. Disallowed (R.V. "rejected")—first and primarily by the Jews and their rulers, as not answering their expectations, or suiting their way of building, that is, not to be made use of to promote their worldly projects and interests. By representing Christ as being rejected of men, the apostle intimates that He is the person spoken of in Ps. 118. 22, "The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner"; a passage which our Lord referred to in His conversation with the chief priests and elders as a prophecy concerning Himself. (Ps. 118. 22; Matt. 21. 42; Acts 4. 11.)

5. Ye—"believers—as living stones—alive to God through Him—are built up—in union with each other—a spiritual house—being spiritual yourselves, and an habitation of God through the Spirit—an holy priesthood, consecrated to God, and 'holy as He is holy.' To offer up—your souls and bodies, with all your thoughts, words, and actions, as spiritual sacrifices to God"—WESLEY.

"The apostle is commending the Christian Church and constitution to these dispersed Jews. It was natural for them to object that the Christian Church had no such glorious Temple, nor such a numerous priesthood, nor such costly services and sacrifices. To which the apostle answers, That the Christian Church is a much nobler fabric than the Jewish Temple; it is a living temple, consisting, not of dead materials, but of living parts; Christ, the foundation, is a living stone, and Christians also are living stones; and these make a spiritual house, and they are a holy priesthood; and though they have no bloody sacrifices to offer, yet they have much better and more acceptable; and they have an altar on which to present their offerings; for they offer spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ"—M. H. (Eph. 2. 21, 22; Heb. 3. 6; Isa. 61. 6; 66. 21; ver. 9; Hosea 14. 2; Mal. 1. 11; Rom. 12. 1; Heb. 13. 15, 16; Phil. 4. 18; ch. 4. 11.)

6. It is contained in the Scripture—"namely, in Isa. 28. 16. As the quotation is not literally given, either from the Hebrew or the Greek, we may reasonably regard it as made from memory"—C. B.

He that believeth shall not be confounded—"in time or in eternity"—WESLEY.

"The meaning of the Hebrew is fairly expressed by the English version, shall not make haste, shall go on his way calmly, shall not be put to a hurried or hasty flight. Here S. Peter follows the LXX., which expresses substantially the same thought"—C. B. (Isa. 28. 16; Rom. 9. 33.)

7. He is precious (R.V. "There is the preciousness," margin, "the honour"). "The words stand in direct connection with 'shall not be confounded' in the previous verse, and are not a predicate asserting what Christ is, but declare that honour, not shame, is the portion of those who believe in Him"—C. B. To them who believe He is become the head of the corner—"the chief corner-stone, on which the whole building rests. Unbelievers, too, will at length find Him such to their sorrow. (Matt. 21. 44)"—WESLEY. (Ps. 118. 22; Matt. 21. 42; Acts 4. 11.)

8. And a stone of stumbling. The words are taken from Isa. 8. 13, 14, 15. "Thus also Simeon, 'This child is set for the fall as well as the rising again of many in Israel' (Luke 2. 34), a prediction awfully fulfilled"—B. The doctrine is that which meets us continually in Scripture, that the gospel of Christ must influence, for good or for evil, the character and the destiny of every man to whom it comes. Who stumble: whereunto also they were appointed. "They who believe not, 'stumble,' and fall, and perish for ever, God having appointed from all eternity, 'He that believeth not shall be damned'"—WESLEY. (Isa. 8. 14; Luke 2. 34; Rom. 9. 33; 1 Cor. 1. 23; Ex. 9. 16; Rom. 9. 22; 1 Thess. 5. 9; Jude 4.)

9. But ye—"who believe in Christ are, in a higher sense than ever the Jews were—a chosen or elect race, a royal priesthood—'kings and priests unto God' (Rev. 1. 6). As princes, ye have power with God, and victory over sin, the world, and the devil; as priests, ye are consecrated to God, for offering spiritual sacrifices. Ye Christians are as one holy nation, under Christ your King. A purchased people—who are His peculiar property —that ye may show forth—by your whole behaviour, to all mankind—the virtues—the excellent glory, the mercy, wisdom, and power of Him, Christ, who hath called you out of the darkness of ignorance, error, sin, and misery"—WESLEY.

For a peculiar people (A.V.), or a "purchased people" (WESLEY), R.V. has "a people for God's own possession." "We have here 'a mosaic of Old Testament phrases,' all originally applied to the people of Israel, and now declared to apply equally to the Christian Church. The marginal references point out the passages which were in the writer's mind. They were called to this state of salvation out of darkness, idolatry, superstition, and ungodliness, into His marvellous light. And they had these privileges that they might show forth the praises of Him who had called them; literally the virtues, or, as R.V., 'the excellences,' the wisdom and truth and justice and goodness of God. These they were to show in a holy and useful life"—C. (Deut. 10. 15; ch. 1. 2; Ex. 19. 5, 6; Rev. 1. 6; ver. 10; John 17. 19; 1 Cor. 3. 17; 2 Tim. 1. 9; Deut. 4. 20; 7. 6; 14. 2; 26. 18, 19; Acts 20. 28; Eph. 1. 14; Tit. 2. 14; Acts 26. 18; Eph. 5. 8; Col. 1. 13; 1 Thess. 4. 5.)

10. Who in time past were not a people—"much less the people of God; but scattered individuals of many nations. The former part of the verse particularly respects the Gentiles, the latter the Jews"—WESLEY.

"This is a quotation from Hosea 2. 23, where the conversion of the Gentiles is foretold, as S. Paul informs us in Rom. 9. 25"—B. According to the connection in which the words stand in the prophecy, they evidently refer, in the first instance, to the restoration of the Jews to the Divine favour, after a period of apostasy and rejection. And it must not be forgotten that S. Peter wrote to the "sojourners of the Dispersion." Remark the freedom with which S. Peter, the apostle of the Circumcision, applies to all Christians, language formerly used to describe the privileges of Israel. He regards all believers, as S. Paul did, as Abraham's spiritual seed. (Hosea 1. 9, 10; 2. 23; Rom. 9. 25.)

Vers. 11-25. THE CONDUCT BECOMING PILGRIMS.—11. "Here begins the exhortation drawn from the second motive. Sojourners: pilgrims. The first word properly means, those who are in a strange house; the second, those who are in a strange country. You 'sojourn' in the body; you are 'pilgrims' in this world. Abstain from desires of anything in this house or in this country"—WESLEY.

"They are strangers and pilgrims, and should not impede their passage by giving in to the wickedness of the country through which they pass. Which war against the soul. Sin destroys the moral liberty of the soul; it debilitates it by impairing its faculties; it robs it of comfort and peace; debases and destroys its dignity; hinders its present prosperity, and plunges it into everlasting misery"—M. H. (1 Chron. 29. 15; Ps. 39. 12; 119. 19; Heb. 11. 13; ch. 1. 17; Rom. 13. 14; Gal. 5. 16; James 4. 1.)

12. Honest—"not barely unblamable, but virtuous in every respect. But our language sinks under the force, beauty, and copiousness of the original expressions. That they by your good works which they shall behold—see with their own eyes—may glorify God—by owning His grace in you, and following your example. In the day of visitation—the time when He shall give them fresh offers of His mercy"—WESLEY.

They speak against you as evildoers. "So in Acts 28. 22, 'a sect everywhere spoken against.' It is the common lot of Christians to be evil spoken of by wicked men; a clean, just, good conversation may not only stop their mouths, but may possibly be a means to bring them to God; they now call you evildoers; vindicate yourselves by good works, and this is the way to convince them"—M. H. (Rom. 12. 17; 2 Cor. 8. 21; Phil. 2. 15; Tit. 2. 8; ch. 3. 16; Matt. 5. 16; Luke 19. 44.)

13. Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man—"to every secular power. Instrumentally these are ordained by men; but originally all their power is from God"—WESLEY.

"Every human institution. S. Peter condemns the principles of the Zealots, who maintained that obedience was due to those magistrates only who were appointed by God, as the Jewish kings had been. For the Lord's sake—remembering His example, and jealous of the honour of His name. To the King. Though at Rome the name of kings was odious, the people in the provinces gave that name to the Emperor, the Greek language not supplying a word with the full significance of the Roman Imperator. When this Epistle was written, Nero was Emperor"—B. (Matt. 22. 21; Rom. 13. 1; Tit. 3. 1.)

14. "Or to subordinate governors or magistrates"—WESLEY.

Sent by Him. "Those who from time to time were the local representatives of the supreme authority. The identity of thought with Rom. 13. 3, 4, will be noticed as another coincidence in the teaching of the two apostles. Both recognise that even an imperfect and corrupt government works, on the whole, for greater good than anarchy"—C. B.

15. For so is the will of God. This was to be the reply of the Christian to the charges continually brought against him, the unanswerable argument of a blameless life. "The ignorance of them who blame you, because they do not know you; a strong motive to pity them" —WESLEY. (Tit. 2. 8; ver. 12.)

16. As free—"yet obeying governors for God's sake"—WESLEY.

"Free in the noblest sense, in consequence of your relation to Christ, as sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, and therefore heirs of God. Free from the dominion of sin and Satan, the world and the flesh, yet not from subjection to magistrates"—B. (Gal. 5. 1, 13; 1 Cor. 7. 22.)

17. Honour all men—"as being made in the image of God, bought by His Son, and designed for His kingdom. Honour the king —pay him all that regard both in affection and action which the laws of God and man require" —WESLEY.

Perhaps no finer example of the laconic style could be found anywhere than in this passage. Observe that the special love of the Christian to the brotherhood does not exclude the general duty of loving his neighbour, any more than the special duty of honouring the king interferes with the general duty of honouring all men. (Rom. 12. 10; Phil. 2. 3; Heb. 13. 1; ch. 1. 22; Prov. 24. 21; Matt. 22. 21; Rom. 13. 7.)

18. Servants—"lit. 'household servants.' With all fear—of offending them or God. Not only to the good—tender, kind—and gentle—mild, easily forgiving"—WESLEY.

"The fulness with which slaves are addressed here and in Eph. 6. 5–8; Col. 3. 22; 1 Tim. 6. 1, 2, indicates the large number of converts who belonged to that class. The word 'household servants' may have been chosen as including the wide class of libertini or freedmen and freedwomen, who, though no longer in the status of slavery, were still largely employed in the households of the upper classes. Nearly all the names in Rom. 16., and many of those of other members of the Church, are found in the Columbaria or Catacombs of Rome, as belonging to slaves or freedmen. With all fear. There was, in the then existing relations of society, a comparative nobleness in a service into which the fear of offending their master, as distinct from the mere dread of punishment, entered as a motive for obedience"—C. B. (Tit. 2. 9.)

19. "This is thankworthy (R.V. 'acceptable,' lit. 'grace.') For conscience toward God—from a pure desire of pleasing Him. Grief—severe treatment"—WESLEY.

Suffering wrongfully. "This was the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount. The allowance of any exception to the rule makes it inoperative. Each party in a quarrel thinks himself at the moment in the right, and it is only by acting on the principle that the more he believes himself to be in the right the more it is his duty to submit patiently, that a man can free himself from endless recrimination and retaliation"—C. B. (Matt. 5. 10; Rom. 13. 5; ch. 3. 14.)

20. Buffeted for your faults—"the common practice of Roman life, as of all countries where slavery has prevailed"—C. B. (Ch. 3. 14; 4. 14, 15.)

21. Hereunto are ye—Christians—called —to suffer wrongfully. Leaving you an example—when He went to God. That ye might follow His steps—of innocence and patience"—WESLEY.

An example. The word literally means a pattern to be copied, in writing or drawing. Thus S. Peter paints the character of Christ, laying stress upon those points in which it would be a guide to these ill-used slaves. (Matt. 16. 24; Acts 14. 22; 1 Thess. 3. 3; 2 Tim. 3. 12; ch. 3. 13; John 13. 15; Phil. 2. 5; 1 John 2. 6.)

22, 23. Who did no sin. "This is an allusion to the words of Isaiah concerning the Messiah. (Ch. 53. 9.) 'Neither was any deceit in His mouth.' He was reviled—being called a Samaritan, a glutton, a wine-bibber, a blasphemer, a demoniac, one in league with Beelzebub, a perverter of the nation, and a deceiver of the people"—B. "In all these instances the example of Christ is peculiarly adapted to the state of servants, who easily slide into either sin or guile, reviling their fellow-servants, or threatening them, the natural result of anger without power. He committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously, the only solid ground of patience in affliction" —WESLEY. (Isa. 53. 9; Luke 23. 41; John 8. 46; 2 Cor. 5. 21; Heb. 4. 15; Isa. 53. 7; Matt. 27. 39; John 8. 48, 49; Heb. 12. 3; Luke 23. 46.)

24. "Lest any should think from what is said in vers. 21, 22, 23, that Christ's death was designed only for an example of patience under sufferings, the apostle here adds a more glorious design and effect of it"—M. H. Who Himself bore our sins—"that is, the punishment due to them—in His afflicted, torn, dying body on the tree—the cross, whereon chiefly slaves or servants were wont to suffer. That we being dead to sin—wholly delivered both from the guilt and power of it; indeed, without an atonement first made for the guilt, we could never have been delivered from the power. Might live to righteousness—which is one only. The sins we had committed, and He bore, were manifold"—WESLEY.

Dead to sin. The resemblance to S. Paul's language (Rom. 6. 2, 11; Gal. 2. 19) can scarcely have been accidental. By whose stripes. We may well believe that the specific term was chosen rather than any more general term, as bringing before the minds of the slave readers of the Epistle that feature in their Lord's sufferings in which they would recognise the closest parallel with their own. (Isa. 53. 4-6, 11; Matt. 8. 17; Heb. 9. 28; Rom. 7. 6; Isa. 53. 5.)

25. As sheep going astray. "The apostle has still in his mind the beautiful fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. Ye were wandering out of the way of truth and duty, of safety, holiness, and happiness, into the by-paths of error and sin. Returned—through the influence of Divine grace"—B. The bishop—"the kind observer, inspector, or overseer—of your souls"—WESLEY. (Isa. 53. 6; Ezek. 34. 6; 34. 23; 37. 24; John 10. 11, 14, 16; Heb. 13. 20; ch. 5. 4.)

CHAPTER III.

Vers. 1-7. DUTIES OF WIVES AND HUSBANDS. 1, 2. Likewise—"as I have exhorted servants to be in subjection to their masters, in like manner I say"—B. Your own husbands. "The word 'own' is intended to lay stress on the fact that their husbands, because they were such, had a right to expect a due measure of obedience in all things lawful"—C. B. If any—"he speaks tenderly"—WESLEY.

Even if any (R.V.), indicating that in many cases both husband and wife embraced Christianity at the same time. Won—"gained over to Christ"—WESLEY.

Conversation (R.V. "behaviour"). "Joined with a loving fear of displeasing them"—WESLEY.

"S. Peter wisely intimates to these Christian women, that the silent persuasion of a becoming behaviour would be more effectual in winning their unbelieving husbands, than many arguments, proposed perhaps with heat, for the purpose of convincing them"—B. (1 Cor. 14. 34; Eph. 5. 22; Col. 3. 18; Tit. 2. 5; 1 Cor. 7. 16; Matt. 18. 15; 1 Cor. 9. 19-22; ch. 2. 12.)

3. "Three things are here expressly forbidden—curling the hair, wearing gold (by way of ornament), and putting on gay and costly apparel. These, therefore, ought never to be allowed, much less defended, by Christians"—WESLEY. (1 Tim. 2. 9; Tit. 2. 3, etc.)

4. The hidden man of the heart—"complete inward holiness, which implies a meek and quiet spirit. A meek spirit gives no trouble willingly to any; a quiet spirit bears all wrongs without being troubled. In the sight of God—who looks at the heart. All superfluity of dress contributes more to pride and anger than is generally supposed. The apostle seems to have his eye to this by substituting meekness and quietness in the room of the ornaments he forbids. 'I do not regard these things,' is often said by those whose hearts are wrapped up in them; but offer to take them away, and you touch the very idol of their soul. Some, indeed, only dress elegantly that they may be looked on; that is, they squander away their Lord's talent to gain applause; thus making sin to beget sin, and then plead one in excuse of the other"—WESLEY.

In the incorruptible apparel of a meek and quiet spirit (R.V.). Even gold and silver and gems are in their very nature perishable; not so that moral and spiritual adornment which is within the reach of all. "The question may be asked, Are the apostle's words prohibitive? Is it wrong for Christian women now to plait their hair, or to wear gold ornaments or pearls? The answer must be left mainly to the individual conscience. As some help to a decision, it may be noted—(1) that the language is not that of formal prohibition, but of a comparative estimate of the value of the two kinds of adornment; (2) that in regard to the third kind of ornamentation, seeing that some clothes must be worn, the words cannot have a merely prohibitory force; and (3) that in the possible, if not common case of the husband giving such ornaments and wishing his wife to wear them, the meek and quiet spirit would naturally show itself in compliance rather than in obstinate refusal. On the whole we may say, that while the words do not condemn the use of jewellery, or attention to the colour and form of dress, within the limits of simplicity and economy, they tend to minimise that form of personal adornment, and bid women trust not to them, but to moral qualities as elements of attraction"—C. B. Meek and quiet. "So far as we can distinguish, where it is almost impossible to separate, 'meekness,' the absence of self-assertion, may be thought of as the cause, and 'quietness' as the effect. In their union, the apostle, speaking, we may hope, from his own experience, rightly finds a charm compared with which gold and jewels are as nothing"—C. B. (Ps. 45. 13; Rom. 2. 29; 7. 22; 2 Cor. 4. 16.)

5. "The adorning of those holy women who trusted in God, and therefore did not act thus from servile fear, was—(1) their meek subjection to their husbands; (2) their quiet spirit, 'not afraid,' or amazed; and (3) their unblamable behaviour, 'doing' all things 'well'"—WESLEY.

6. Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham. (Gen. 12. 5; 18. 6.) By mentioning the reverence with which Sarah spoke of Abraham, the apostle intimates that she entertained the highest respect for him, and a just sense of her own subjection to him. Whose children ye are now (R.V. "In a spiritual as well as a natural sense, and entitled to the same inheritance, while ye discharge your conjugal duties not out of fear but for conscience sake"—WESLEY.

Are not afraid with any amazement (R.V. "Put in fear by any terror"). "While they were to submit to their husbands in all things lawful, they were not to be discouraged from any duty, or induced, through fear of displeas ing their husbands, to do actions contrary to their religion"—B. (Gen. 18. 12.)

7. Dwell with the woman according to knowledge—"knowing they are weak, and therefore to be used with all tenderness. Yet do not despise them for this, but give them honour—both in heart, in word, and in action; as those who are called to be joint-heirs of that eternal life which ye and they hope to receive by the free grace of God. That your prayers be not hindered—on the one part or the other. All sin hinders prayer; particularly anger. Anything at which we are angry is never more apt to come into our mind than when we are at prayer; and those who do not forgive will find no forgiveness from God"—WESLEY.

"In the term vessel we have the thought that all, men and women alike, are instruments which God has made for His service. (2 Tim. 2. 20, 21)"—C. B. (1 Cor. 7. 3; Eph. 5. 25; Col. 3. 19; 1 Cor. 12. 23; 1 Thess. 4. 4; Job 42. 8; Matt. 5. 23, 24; 18. 19.)

Vers. 8–22, 4. 11. GENERAL EXHORTATIONS.

8. Finally. "This part of the Epistle reaches to ch. 4. 11. The apostle seems to have added the rest afterwards. Sympathising—rejoicing and sorrowing together. Love all believers as brethren. Be pitiful—toward the afflicted. Be courteous—to all men. Courtesy is such a behaviour toward equals and inferiors as shows respect mixed with love"—WESLEY.

"For be courteous the R.V. has 'humble-minded,' which is probably the correct reading. This forms the conclusion to a beautiful climax, and presents the root of the preceding qualities"—W. W. (Rom. 12. 16; 15. 5; Phil. 3. 16; Rom. 12. 10; Heb. 13. 1; ch. 2. 17; Col. 3. 12; Eph. 4. 32.)

9. Not rendering—alluding to Christ's precepts and example. Ye were called. The apostle glances at their original condition, at the Being into whose service they were admitted, at the high end and destiny reserved for them. These considerations would move them to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called. (Eph. 4. 1.) Ye are called to inherit a blessing—"therefore their railing cannot hurt you; and by 'blessing' them, you imitate God, who blesses you"—WESLEY. (Prov. 17. 13; 20. 22; Matt. 5. 39; Rom. 12. 14, 17; 1 Cor. 4. 12; 1 Thess. 5. 15; Matt. 25. 34.)

10. For he that desireth to love life, and to see good days—"that would make life amiable and desirable"—WESLEY.

Refrain his tongue from evil—"from railing, backbiting, talebearing, and all rash and provoking expressions. Speak no guile—nothing contrary to simplicity and sincerity. In this and the following verses, the apostle offers three arguments of great importance, to induce even men to the practice of piety and virtue—(1) it secures the happiness both of the present and of the future life; (2) it insures the favour and protection of God (ver. 12); (3) it disarms the malice of men (ver. 13)"—B. (Ps. 34. 12; James 1. 26; ch. 2. 1, 22; Rev. 14. 5.)

11. Eschew evil (R.V. "Turn away from evil"). "From evil dispositions, as well as evil words and actions"—B. Let him seek—"to live peaceably with all men—and pursue it—even when it seems to flee from him"—WESLEY. (Ps. 37. 27; Isa. 1. 16, 17; 3 John 11; Rom. 12. 18; 14. 19; Heb. 12. 14.)

12. "The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous—for good. Anger appears in the whole face; love, chiefly in the eyes"—WESLEY.

It will be observed that S. Peter commonly quotes from the Old Testament, without using any form of quotation, in a manner which suggests that he wrote to persons to whom it was perfectly familiar. In this respect the ancient Church was a pattern for us. (John 9. 31; James 5. 16.)

13. Who is he that will harm you—"none can"—WESLEY.

Followers of that which is good (R.V. "Zealous for"). As a word in frequent use among devout Jews, it would carry special weight. Be zealous not for the external and ceremonial part of religion, but for that which is morally and eternally good. (Prov. 16. 7; Rom. 8. 28.)

14. But and if ye suffer. "This is not a harm to you, but a good"—WESLEY.

The apostle quotes almost verbally from the Sermon on the Mount, then passes on immediately to repeat the exhortation which Isaiah gave to the Jews when threatened with an Assyrian invasion. Fear ye not their fear. "The very words of the LXX. (Isa. 8. 12, 13.) Let not that fear be in you which the wicked feel"—WESLEY. (Matt. 5. 10–12; ch. 2. 19; 4. 14; James 1. 12; Isa. 8. 12, 13; Jer. 1. 8; John 14. 1, 27.)

15. But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts—"have a holy fear, and a full trust in His wise providence. The hope—of eternal life. With meekness—for anger would hurt your cause as well as your soul. And fear—a filial fear offending God, and a jealousy over yourselves, lest ye speak amiss"—WESLEY.

Sanctify Christ as Lord (R.V.). "The whole text in Isaiah was doubtless in the apostle's mind, 'Let Him be your fear,' etc. Sanctify Him by fearing Him more than men; by believing all His promises; by trusting in His wisdom, power, and goodness; by acknowledging His justice in the punishments He inflicts; and by patiently bearing all the trials He is pleased to appoint. By these dispositions, believers sanctify God in their hearts; they give Him the glory of all His perfections"—B. Ready to give an answer—"by a familiar acquaintance with the doctrines and with the evidences of your holy religion, and by that cheerfulness and presence of mind which spring from a consciousness of your practical regard to it"—B. (Ps. 119. 46; Acts 4. 8; Col. 4. 6; 2 Tim. 2. 25.)

16. Having a good conscience. "So much the more beware of anger, to which the very consciousness of your innocence may betray you. Join with a good conscience meekness and fear, and you obtain a complete victory. Your good conversation in Christ—that is, which flows from faith in Him"—WESLEY.

They speak evil of you. At this time Christians were charged especially with doctrines and conduct subversive of the peace and order of society, with "turning the world upside down" (Acts 17. 6). (Heb. 13. 18; Tit. 2. 8; ch. 2. 12.)

17. "It is infinitely better, if it be the will of God, ye should suffer. His permissive will appears from His Providence"—WESLEY.

If the will of God should so will (R.V.). "Men naturally feel most aggrieved when they suffer wrongfully. But the apostle reminds us that if we suffer for well-doing, the testimony of a good conscience, and the sense of the Divine favour, will support us; while those who suffer for evil-doing, will not only be destitute of such support, but will endure all the torment which the guilty mind inflicts upon itself in self-reproach and in forebodings of the future. And further, in suffering for the truth, we have the comfort of reflecting that we follow our blessed Redeemer"—B.

18. For—"this is undoubtedly best, whereby we are most conformed to Christ. Now Christ suffered once—to suffer no more—for sins—not His own, but ours—the just for the unjust—the word signifies, not only them who have wronged their neighbours, but those who have transgressed any of the commands of God; as the preceding word, 'just,' denotes a person who has fulfilled, not barely social duties, but all kind of righteousness. That He might bring us to God—now to His gracious favour, hereafter to His blissful presence, by the same steps of suffering and of glory. Being put to death in the flesh—as man—but raised to life by the Spirit—both by His own Divine power, and by the power of the Holy Ghost"—WESLEY.

"In the sufferings of Christ we have a clear proof that sufferings are no evidence of the wickedness of the sufferer, or of the badness of his cause; and the power of God, visible in Christ's resurrection, affords to those who lose their lives for the gospel sure ground of hope that God will raise them also at the last day"—B. (Rom. 5. 6; Heb. 9. 26, 28; ch. 2. 21; 4. 1; Col. 1. 21, 22; Rom. 1. 4; 8. 11.)

19. By which Spirit He preached—"through the ministry of Noah—to the spirits in prison—the unholy men before the flood, who were then reserved by the justice of God, as in a prison, till He executed the sentence upon them all; and are now also reserved to the judgment of the great day"—WESLEY.

20. When the long-suffering of God waited—"for a hundred and twenty years; all the time the ark was preparing; during which Noah warned them all to flee from the wrath to come"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits once, and for saved by water has "saved through water," with a marginal reading, "brought safely through water." The interpretation of this difficult passage in Mr. Wesley's Note is that which has been adopted by commentators in general. "If we consider the purpose for which the fact is mentioned here, we shall see reason to conclude that those to whom Christ is said to have preached were the antediluvian sinners in the time of Noah. Clearly the object of the apostle is to show that Christ acted for the salvation of men in the administration of the Spirit in former and ancient times, even as He does now. A gospel of grace and righteousness, of faith and obedience, was preached to them as to us, by which the believing and obedient lived as now (ver. 21), but under which the unbelieving and disobedient perished (ch. 4. 6). The expression, went and preached, as applied to Christ preaching by Noah, may be compared with Eph. 2. 17, 'He came and preached peace,' which applies to His preaching by the apostles"—W. W. (Ch. 1. 12; 4. 6; Isa. 13. 7; 49. 9; 61. 1; Gen. 6. 3; 5. 13; Heb. 11. 7; Gen. 7. 7; 8. 18; 2 Pet. 2. 5.)

21. The antitype whereof—"the thing typified by the ark, even baptism, now saveth us—that is, through the water of baptism we are saved from the sin which overwhelms the world as a flood; not, indeed, the bare outward sign, but the inward grace; a Divine consciousness that both our persons and our actions are accepted through Him who died and rose again for us"—WESLEY.

Which also after a true likeness doth now save you, even baptism, not . . . but the interrogation (margin, "inquiry or appeal") of a good conscience toward God (R.V.). "The most natural interpretation of the expression is perhaps to be found, partly in the forensic use of the Greek word for 'question,' as including, like our word 'examination,' both question and answer, and partly in the fact that at a date so early that it is reasonable to infer an apostolic origin, the liturgical administration of (adult) baptism involved interrogatives and replies, in substance identical with those that have been in use in the Church at large, and are in use still. In this practice of interrogation we find that which explains S. Peter's meaning. Of the essence of the saving power of baptism is the confession and the profession which precedes it. If that comes from a conscience that really renounces sin and believes on Christ, then baptism, as the channel through which the grace of the new birth is conveyed, and the convert admitted into the Church of Christ, 'saves us,' but not otherwise"—C. B. By the resurrection of Christ. "The apostle shows that the efficacy of baptism to salvation depends upon the resurrection of Christ, which supposes His death, and is the foundation of our faith and hope, to which we are rendered conformable by dying to sin, and rising again to holiness and newness of life"—M. H. (Eph. 5. 26; Tit. 3. 5; Rom. 10. 10; ch. 1. 3.)

22. Angels and authorities and powers—"that is, all orders both of angels and men"—WESLEY.

Being made subject to Him. "The apostle, in speaking here of the resurrection and glory of Christ, means not only to represent Him as the object of our confidence, but to intimate that, if we imitate His courageous fidelity, we may hope to partake with Him in His glory"—B. (Ps. 110. 1; Rom. 8. 34; Eph. 1. 20; Col. 3. 1; Heb. 1. 3; Rom. 8. 38; 1 Cor. 15. 24; Eph. 1. 21.)

CHAPTER IV.

1. Arm yourselves with the same mind—"which will be armour of proof against all your enemies. For he that hath suffered in the flesh—that hath so suffered as to be thereby made inwardly and truly conformable to the sufferings of Christ—hath ceased from sin—is delivered from it"—WESLEY.

"The apostle draws a new inference from the consideration of Christ's sufferings. As he had before made use of it to persuade to patience in suffering, so here to mortification of sin"—M. H. Hath ceased—"is discharged from the service of sin. By the Roman law, a slave who was delivered up as a public offender became freed from his master. After undergoing his sentence, the offender was enfranchised"—W. W. (Ch. 3. 18; Rom. 6. 2, 7; Gal. 5. 24; Col. 3. 3, 5.)

2. That ye may no longer live in the flesh—"even in this mortal body—to the desires of men—either your own or those of others. These are various; but the will of God is one"—WESLEY.

"The lusts of men are springs of all their wickedness; let the occasional temptations be what they will, they could not prevail, but for men's own corruptions"—M. H. (Rom. 14. 7; ch. 2. 1; Gal. 2. 20; ch. 1. 14; John 1. 13; Rom. 6. 11; 2 Cor. 5. 15; James 1. 18.)

3. For the time past of our life may suffice us. "The expression is soft, but conveys a very strong meaning—namely, that at no period of our lives ought we to have wrought the will of the Gentiles; and that whatever time we spent in so doing was too much"—B. The will of the Gentiles. The grossest forms of immorality were sanctioned by public opinion, and were promoted by religious observances among the idolatrous Gentiles. Revellings, banquetings. "Have these words any meaning now? They had seventeen hundred years ago. Then the former meant, meetings to eat; meetings, the direct end of which was to please the taste; the latter, meetings to drink; both of which Christians then ranked with abominable idolatries"—WESLEY. (Ezek. 44. 6; 45. 9; Acts 17. 30; Eph. 2. 2; 4. 17; 1 Thess. 4. 5; Tit. 3. 3; ch. 1. 14.)

4. They think it strange. "It is not hard, even from our own experience, to picture to ourselves the surprise of the heathen when he found his friend refusing an invitation to a banquet, shrinking from contact with the prostitutes of Greek cities, or, when there, passing the wine-cup untasted"—C. B. The same—"as ye did once—speaking evil of you—as proud, singular, silly, wicked, and the like"—WESLEY. (Acts 13. 45; 18. 6; ch. 3. 6.)

5. Who shall give account—"of this, as well as all their other ways—to Him who is ready—so faith represents Him now"—WESLEY.

They, who now call you to account falsely, shall have to give account themselves for this very evil-speaking (Jude 15), and be condemned justly. (Acts 10. 42; 17. 31; Rom. 14. 10, 12; 1 Cor. 15. 51, 52; 2 Tim. 4. 1; James 5. 9.)

6. For to this end was the gospel preached—"ever since it was given to Adam—to them that are now dead—in their several generations—that they might be judged—that though they were judged—in the flesh according to the manner of men—with rash, unrighteous judgment—they might live according to the will and word of God, in the Spirit; the soul renewed after His image"—WESLEY.

"S. Peter, representing the attitude of the Church in every age, expecting Christ at any moment, says, the Judge is ready to judge the quick and the dead; the dead, I say, for they too in their lifetime have had the gospel preached to them, that so they might be judged at the last in the same way as those living now, viz. men in the flesh, and that they might, having escaped condemnation by embracing the gospel so preached, live unto God in the Spirit. Live according to God means, live a life with God, such as God lives, as contrasted with according to men in the flesh"—P. (Ch. 3. 19.)

7. But the end of all things—"and so of their wrongs, and your sufferings—is at hand; be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer—temperance helps watchfulness, and both of them help prayer. Watch, that ye may pray; and pray, that ye may watch"—WESLEY.

Be ye therefore of sound mind, and be sober unto prayer (R.V.). "The second verb implies, in the strictest sense, abstinence from wine and strong drink. The word commonly translated watch (Matt. 24. 42, 43; 26. 38–41) is altogether different. It may be noticed that the tense of the two verbs in the original implies not a general precept, but a call to an immediate act. The words of S. Peter present a singular contrast to the effect that has commonly been produced by the belief that the end of the world was near. Terror and alarm, the abandonment of earthly callings and social duties, accompanied that belief in the tenth century, when kings left their thrones and sought the seclusion of the monastery. 'Appropinquante jam fine sæculi,' and a like agitation has accompanied it since. To the apostle's mind the approach of the end of all things is a motive for calmness and self-control"—C. B. (Matt. 24. 13, 14; Rom. 13. 12; Phil. 4. 5; Heb. 10. 25; James 5. 8; 2 Pet. 3. 9, 11; 1 John 2. 18; Matt. 26. 41; Luke 21. 34; Col. 4. 12; ch. 1. 13; ver. 8.)

8. Love covered a multitude of sins—"yea, 'love covereth all things.' He that loves another, covers his faults, how many soever they be. He turns away his own eyes from them; and, as far as is possible, hides them from others. And he continually prays that all the sinner's iniquities may be forgiven and his sins covered. Meantime the God of love measures to him with the same measure into his bosom"—WESLEY.

"Covereth so as not harshly to condemn or expose faults, but forbearingly to bear the other's burdens, forgiving and forgetting past offences. Perhaps the additional idea is included, that by prayer for them, love tries to have them covered by God; and so, being the instrument of converting the sinner from his error, covereth a multitude of sins. But the former idea, taken from Prov. 10. 12, is the prominent one"—P. (Heb. 13. 1; Col. 3. 14; Prov. 10. 12; 1 Cor. 13. 7; James 5. 20.)

9. One to another—"ye that are of different towns or countries. Without murmuring—with all cheerfulness"—WESLEY.

Use hospitality. "The stress laid upon this virtue in the New Testament brings before us striking features of the social life of Christians in the first three centuries. The Christian in a strange city was in a position of no little difficulty. The houses of heathen friends, if he had any, were likely to bring trials of one kind or another. He might be taunted and persecuted for his faith; or he might be tempted to 'run to the same excess of riot' with them. Inns presented too often scenes of drunkenness and impurity, foul words and fouler acts. It was an unspeakable gain for such an one to find shelter in a Christian home, to present a 'letter of commendation' (2 Cor. 3. 1), and to be received as a brother. It was in the nature of things that strangers might thus present themselves under inconvenient conditions, and therefore S. Peter adds without murmurings. Men were not to look upon it as a trouble or a nuisance; they might be entertaining angels unawares (Heb. 13. 2)"—C. B. (Rom. 12. 13; 2 Cor. 9. 7; Phil. 2. 14; Philem. 14.)

10. As every one hath received a gift—"spiritual or temporal, ordinary or extraordinary, although the latter seems primarily intended—so minister it one to another—employ it for the common good—as good stewards of the manifold grace of God—the talents wherewith His free love has entrusted you"—WESLEY.

"In receiving and using the manifold gifts of God, we must look upon ourselves as stewards only, and act accordingly. The goods we are entrusted with are our Lord's goods, and must be employed as He directs; and it is required in a steward, that a man be found faithful"—M. H. (Rom. 12. 6; 1 Cor. 4. 7; Matt. 24. 45; 25. 14, 21; Luke 12. 42; 1 Cor. 4. 1, 2; Tit. 1. 7; 1 Cor. 12. 4; Eph. 4. 11.)

11. If any man speak, let him—"in his whole conversation, public and private. Speak as the oracles of God—let all his words be according to this pattern, both as to matter and manner, more especially in public. By this mark we may always know who are, so far, the true or false prophets. The oracles of God teach that men should repent, believe, obey. He that treats of faith and leaves out repentance, or does not enjoin practical holiness to believers, does not speak as the oracles of God; he does not preach Christ, let him think as highly of himself as he will. If any man minister—serve his brother in love, whether in spirituals or temporals—let him minister as of the ability which God giveth—that is, humbly and diligently, ascribing all his power to God, and using it with his might—whose is the glory—of his wisdom, which teaches us to speak. And the might—which enables us to act"—WESLEY.

Speaking as if it were oracles of God (R.V.). His divinely-inspired words are not his own, but God's, and as a steward, having them committed to him, he ought so to speak them. Jesus was the Pattern in this respect. (Matt. 7. 29; John 12. 49; 14. 10.) Ability (R.V. "Strength"). Physical power for outward service, rather than moral or intellectual ability. That God in all things may be glorified—the final end of all a Christian's acts. To whom (R.V. "Whose, Christ's") is the glory and the dominion for ever and ever. (Jer. 23. 22; Rom. 12. 6-8; 1 Cor. 3. 10; Eph. 5. 20; ch. 2. 5; 1 Tim. 6. 16; ch. 5. 11; Rev. 1. 6.)

Vers. 12-19. CONSOLATION UNDER TROUBLE.—12. Wonder not at the burning which is among you—"this is the literal meaning of the expression. It seems to include both martyrdom itself, which so frequently was by fire, and all the other sufferings joined with, or previous to, it; which is permitted by the wisdom of God for your trial. Be not surprised at this"—WESLEY.

The fiery trial among you. "The mind of the apostle goes back once more to the afflictions and persecutions, of which he had spoken in ch. 1., 2., 3. He meets the terror they were likely to cause by the thought that all this was to be expected. Men were to enter the kingdom of God 'through much tribulation.' All 'they that would live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution.' The strange thing would be if it were otherwise"—C. B. (1 Cor. 3. 13; ch. 1. 7.)

13. But as ye partake of the sufferings of Christ—"ver. 1, while ye suffer for His sake, rejoice in hope of more abundant glory. For the measure of glory answers the measure of suffering; and much more abundantly"—WESLEY.

Rejoice. The apostle remembers the Beatitude in Matt. 5. 11. Inasmuch (R.V. "Insomuch"). The Greek conjunction expresses more than the ground of the joy. Men are to rejoice "in proportion as" they are sharers in the sufferings of Christ. (Acts 5. 41; James 1. 2; Rom. 8. 17; 2 Cor. 1. 7; 4. 10; Phil. 3. 10; Col. 1. 24; 2 Tim. 2. 12; ch. 5. 1, 10; Rev. 1. 9; ch. 1. 5, 6.)

14. If ye are reproached for Christ—"reproaches and cruel mockings were always one part of their sufferings. The Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you—the same Spirit which was upon Christ. (Luke 4. 18.) He is here termed, 'the Spirit of glory,' conquering all reproach and shame, and 'the Spirit of God,' whose Son, Jesus Christ is. On their part He is blasphemed, but on your part He is glorified—that is, while they are blaspheming Christ, you glorify Him in the midst of your sufferings (ver. 16)"—WESLEY.

Lit. In the name of Christ. Again the evident reference is to the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5. 11, "for My sake"). The Spirit of glory. Believers may well overcome the reproach of the world, seeing that the Spirit of glory rests upon them, as it did on Christ. R.V. omits the latter portion of the verse. On their part, etc. (Matt. 5. 11; 2 Cor. 12. 10; James 1. 12; ch. 2. 12; 2. 19, 20; 3. 14; 3. 16.)

15. Let none of you deservedly suffer, as an evildoer—"in any kind"—WESLEY.

The second as, see R.V., distinguishes the busybody in other men's matters from the previous class of delinquents. Christians, from mistaken zeal, might easily step out of their own calling, and make themselves judges of others. Lit. "a bishop in what is (not his own but) another's province," a self-constituted overseer of other people. (Ch. 2. 20; 1 Thess. 4. 11; 1 Tim. 5. 13.)

16. Let him glorify God—'who giveth him the honour so to suffer, and so great a reward for suffering"—WESLEY.

A Christian—a name first given, probably in contempt, by the Greeks at Antioch. The Jews, who denied that Jesus was Christ, would not call His followers Christians. The date of this epistle must have been when this had become the recognised designation among Gentiles, and when the name exposed one to reproach and suffering, though not as yet to systematic persecution. (Acts 5. 41.)

17. The time is come for judgment to begin at the house of God. "God first visits His Church, and that both in justice and mercy. What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel—how terribly will He visit them! The judgments which are milder at the beginning, grow more and more severe. But good men, having already sustained their part, are only spectators of the miseries of the wicked"—WESLEY.

"The words of the apostle stand in close connection with his belief that he was living in the last age of the world, that 'the end of all things was at hand.' He saw in the persecutions and sufferings that fell on the Church, beginning from the house of God, the opening of the judgment"—C. B. (Isa. 10. 12; Jer 25. 29; 49. 12; Ezek. 9. 6; Mal. 3. 5; Luke 23. 31; 10. 12, 14.)

18. If the righteous scarcely be saved—"escape with the utmost difficulty—where shall the ungodly—the man who knows not God—and the open sinner appear—in that day of vengeance. The salvation here primarily spoken of is of a temporal nature. But we may apply the words to eternal things, and then they are still more awful"—WESLEY.

"The righteous man has always more or less of trial, but the issue is certain if he hold fast his confidence in Christ, and the entrance into the kingdom will be abundant at last. The 'scarcely' marks the severity of the ordeal. The ungodly—having no regard for God; negative description; sinner—loving sin; positive character of same person"—P. The text is one of S. Peter's unacknowledged quotations from the Old Testament, the LXX. (Prov. 11. 31; Luke 23. 31.)

19. Let them that suffer according to the will of God—"both for a good cause, and in a right spirit—commit to Him their souls—(whatever becomes of the body) as a sacred depositum—in well-doing—be this your care, to do and suffer well; He will take care of the rest—as unto a faithful Creator—in whose truth, love, and power, ye may safely trust"—WESLEY.

In suffering according to the will of God, much more is meant than submission to an inevitable destiny. If we think of pain and persecution as working out God's will, permitted and controlled by Him, we know that that will is righteous and loving, and that it plans our completeness in holiness and happiness. The example of the Divine Sufferer is in the apostle's mind, and almost on his pen. "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt;" and again as the pattern for committing the soul, "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit." (Ps. 31. 5; Luke 23. 46; 2 Tim. 1. 12.)

CHAPTER V.

Vers. 1–4. COUNSELS TO MINISTERS.—1. I who am a fellow-elder—"so the first though not the head of the apostles appositely and modestly styles himself. And a witness of the sufferings of Christ—having seen Him suffer, and now suffering for Him"—WESLEY.

Witness of the sufferings of Christ. The one point on which he lays stress as distinguishing him from others. His dignity as an apostle is delicately implied, as eye-witnessing was a necessary qualification for the apostleship. (Philem. 9; Luke 24. 48; Acts 1. 8, 22; 5. 32; 10. 39; Rom. 8. 17, 18; Rev. 1. 9.)

2. Feed the flock—"both by doctrine and discipline—not by constraint—unwillingly, as a burden. Not for filthy gain—which, if it be the motive of acting, is 'filthy' beyond expression. Oh consider this, ye that leave one flock and go to another, merely because there is more gain, a large salary! Is it not astonishing that men can see no harm in this? that it is not only practised, but avowed, all over the nation?"—WESLEY.

Tend the flock (R.V. also inserts after "willingly," according to God). S. Peter has in mind Christ's injunction to him, "Feed My sheep," and he invites the elders to share with him the same duty. The word implies all a shepherd's duty, guiding, directing, protecting, as well as supplying food; and thus involves more than preaching and teaching, and takes in all the varied duties of the pastoral office. In the words the flock of God men are reminded who is the chief Shepherd, to whom they will have to render an account. Willingly according to God—ready to encounter the labours and the perils of conspicuous station in the Church, when satisfied that such is the will of God. Not for filthy lucre. The words are interesting, as showing that even in the troubled times in which S. Peter wrote there was enough wealth in the Church to make the position of a bishop-presbyter a lucrative one. The term is one commonly used in one seeking gain in base and sordid ways—C. B. (1 Cor. 9. 17; 1 Tim. 3. 8; Tit. 1. 7.)

3. Neither as lording over the heritage—"behaving in a haughty, domineering manner, as though you had dominion over their conscience. The word translated 'heritage' is, literally, 'the portions.' There is one flock under the one chief Shepherd; but many 'portions' of this under many pastors. But being examples to the flock—this procures the most ready and free obedience"—WESLEY.

Lording it over the charge allotted to you (R.V.). Ensamples—"A monstrosity it is to see the highest rank joined with the meanest mind, the first seat with the lowest life, a grandiloquent tongue with a lazy life, much talking but no fruit"—BERNARD. "The best way a minister can take to engage the respect of a people is to discharge his own duty among them in the best manner that he can, and to be a constant example to them of all that is good"—M. H. (Ezek. 34. 4; Matt. 20. 25, 26; 1 Cor. 3. 9; 2 Cor. 1. 24; Ps. 33. 12; 74. 2; Phil. 3. 17; 2 Thess. 3. 9; 1 Tim. 4. 12; Tit. 2. 7.)

4. A crown of glory that fadeth not away (R.V. "The crown"). "The four last words answer to the one Greek word, amaranthine, or unfading. The crown is the wreath or chaplet of flowers worn by conquerors or heroes, as in 1 Cor. 9. 25; James 1. 12; and differs from the crowns or 'diadems' of Rev. 12. 3; 19. 12, which were distinctively the badge of sovereignty"—C. B. (Heb. 13. 20; 1 Cor. 9. 25; 2 Tim. 4. 8; James 1. 12; ch. 1. 4.

Vers. 5–14. FINAL COUNSELS AND GREETINGS. "Ye younger, be subject to the elder—in years. And be all—elder or younger—subject to each other. Let every one be ready, upon all occasions, to give up his own will. Be clothed with humility—bind it on (so the word signifies), so that no force may be able to tear it from you"—WESLEY.

It is uncertain whether the words elder and younger refer to age only, or to office. In support of the latter view, it may be argued that it is not likely that the same writer would have used the word "elder" in two different senses in such close juxtaposition. Yea, all of you (R.V. "All of you gird yourselves with humility, to serve one another"). This version irresistibly recalls the Master's example, and shows S. Peter teaching the lesson that he learned the night the Lord Jesus was betrayed. God resisteth the proud. Another passage from the Old Testament (Prov. 3. 34, LXX.). (Rom. 12. 10; Eph. 5. 21; Phil. 2. 3; James 4. 6; Isa. 57. 15; 66. 2.)

6. The hand of God—"is in all troubles"—WESLEY.

"Receive His corrections with reverence and patient submission, even though wicked men should be made the instrument of them. In due time—the time which He knows will be the most proper for your exaltation"—B. (James 4. 10.)

7. Casting all your care upon Him—"in every want or pressure"—WESLEY.

Your anxiety (A.V.). Exemption from anxious care goes along with humble submission to God. Careth for you—lit. "respecting you." The word is not so strong as the previous "anxiety." (Ps. 37. 5; 55. 22; Matt. 6. 25; Luke 12. 11, 22; Phil. 4. 6; Heb. 13. 5.)

8. "But in the meantime watch. There is a close connection between this and the duly 'casting our care' upon Him. How deeply has S. Peter himself suffered for want of watching? Be vigilant—as if he had said, Awake, and keep awake. Sleep no more: be this your care. As a roaring lion—full of rage. Seeking—with all subtlety likewise. Whom he may devour or swallow up—both soul and body"—WESLEY.

The tense implies an immediate act, as though he said, "Rouse yourselves to sobriety and watchfulness." R.V. omits "because," and so brings out the strength and terseness of the original. Adversary—lit. "opponent in a court of justice." Devil—"accuser or slanderer." Roaring lion—implying his violent and insatiable thirst for prey. Devour—entangle in worldly "cares," or in other snares, so as finally to destroy. (Luke 21. 34, 36; 1 Thess. 5. 6; ch. 4. 7; Job 1. 7; 2. 2; Luke 22. 31; Rev. 12. 12.)

9. "Be the more steadfast, as ye know the same kind of afflictions are accomplished in—that is, suffered by—your brethren, till the measure allotted them is filled up"—WESLEY.

In your faith (R.V.). The apostle does not allude to unwavering orthodoxy, but to unshaken trust in God. Your brethren—lit. "brotherhood"—that are in the world. "These Christians might sometimes seem to be isolated, but really there were many comrades, far and near, fighting the same battle. It was both their duty and their privilege to follow all examples of steadfastness of which they heard elsewhere, and to set the example themselves, that others might be cheered by it, and might endure to the end"—C. B. (Eph. 6. 11. 13; James 4. 7; Acts 14. 22; 1 Thess. 3. 3; 2 Tim. 3. 12; ch. 2. 21.)

10. Now the God of all grace—"by which alone the whole work is begun, continued, and finished in your soul. After ye have suffered awhile—a very little while compared with eternity. Himself—ye have only to watch and resist the devil: the rest God will perform. Perfect—that no defect may remain. Stablish—that nothing may overthrow you. Strengthen—that ye may conquer all adverse power. And settle you—as an house upon a rock. So the apostle, being converted, does now 'strengthen his brethren'"—WESLEY.

Shall Himself perfect, stablish, strengthen you (R.V.). God of all grace—"the source of all those influences of the Spirit by which alone true spiritual light, peace, and power may be attained. Called us to His eternal glory—not merely to behold it, but to partake it. But this calling is in Christ, not merely by Him as the person by whom the call came, but as being 'in Him,' that is, by virtue of our union with Him. After ye have suffered. Observe, suffering must precede glory"—B. (1 Cor. 1. 9; 1 Tim. 6. 2; 2 Cor. 4. 17; ch. 1. 6; Heb. 13. 21; Jude 24; 2 Thess. 2. 17; 3. 3.)

12. As I suppose—"as I judge, upon good grounds, though not by immediate inspiration. I have written—that is, sent my letter by him. Adding my testimony—to that which ye before heard from Paul, that this is the true gospel of the grace of God"—WESLEY.

Silvanus—the person, probably, of that name whom S. Paul united with himself in writing the Epistles to the Thessalonians, namely, Silas, who (Acts 15. 22, 32) is called "a chief man among the brethren," and a "prophet." Being S. Paul's constant companion in travel after the defection of John Mark, he had assisted in planting churches in Galatia, and in other countries of the Lesser Asia, mentioned ch. 1. 1. So, being well known to the brethren in those parts, he was a fit person to carry to them this letter from S. Peter. As I suppose (R.V. "As I account him")—wherein ye stand (R.V. "Stand ye fast therein"). (2 Cor. 1. 19; Heb. 13. 22; Acts 20. 24; 1 Cor. 15. 1; 2 Pet. 1. 12.)

13. The Church that is at Babylon—"near which S. Peter probably was when he wrote this Epistle—elected together with you—partaking of the same faith with you. Mark—it seems the Evangelist. My son—probably converted by S. Paul. And he had occasionally served him, 'as a son in the gospel'"—WESLEY.

She that is in Babylon, margin, "That is, the Church, or the sister" (R.V.). There was from the days of the Captivity a large Jewish population residing in the new Babylon, which had risen on or near the ruins of the old. Whether "she that is in Babylon" refers to the Church, or to an individual; if the latter, whether it was the wife of the apostle, spoken of 1 Cor. 9. 5, as the companion of his labours, or some conspicuous member of the Church of Babylon unknown to us, are questions which the text does not enable us to decide; and conjecture is useless. (Acts 12. 12, 25.)

14. Peace be with you all. "It is, perhaps, significant that while the final benediction of the Apostle of the Gentiles is "Grace be with you all" (see all his Epistles), that of the Apostle of the Circumcision is the old Hebrew "Peace," as in Matt. 10. 13, in all the fulness of its meaning"—C. B. (Rom. 16. 16; 1 Cor. 16. 20; 2 Cor. 13. 12; 1 Thess. 5. 26; Eph. 6. 23.)

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF PETER.

THE Second Epistle of Peter, written evidently near the close of life, and in anticipation of martyrdom, exhorts believers to perseverance in truth amidst prevailing error and practical infidelity. The best preservative, as he informs them, is progress in piety. In terms of terrible energy he warns them against false teachers, Antinomian in doctrine, worldly, covetous, and scandalously impure in personal conduct; and assures them that the Coming of the Lord, though delayed through His long-suffering, is as certain as the fact of the Deluge. He exhibits the brighter side of the same truth, and exhorts Christians to be diligent and holy. His last precept is "Grow in grace," and his last testimony is to the Divinity of his Lord: "To Him be glory both now and ever, Amen."

"THE PARTS OF THIS EPISTLE ARE THREE—

I. The Inscription, ... Chap. i. 1-2.
II. A further stirring up of the minds of Believers—
1. He exhorts them to give all diligence to grow in grace, . ,, ,, 3-11.
2. He incites them from the firmness of true teachers, . . ,, ,, 12-21.
And from the wickedness of false teachers, . . . ,, ii. 1-28.
3. He guards them against impostors, by confuting their error, . ,, iii. 1-9.
And by describing the great day, ... ,, ,, 10-14.
III. The Conclusion, in which he
1. Declares his agreement with S. Paul, ... ,, ,, 15-16.
2. Repeats the sum of the Epistle, ... ,, ,, 17-18."
—WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

Vers. 1-4. THE INSCRIPTION.—1. To them that have obtained—"not by their own works, but by the free grace of God—like precious faith with us—the apostles. The faith of those who have not seen, being equally precious with that of those who saw our Lord in the flesh. Through the righteousness—both active and passive. Of our God and Saviour—it is this alone by which the justice of God is satisfied, and for the sake of which he gives this precious faith"—WESLEY.

Equally precious (R.V.). "Faith is alike precious in the private Christian and in the apostle; it produces the same precious effects in the one as in the other; faith unites the weak believer to Christ as really as the strong one, and purifies the heart of one as truly as of another"—M. H. R.V. translates, as Wesley, Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ. (Rom. 1. 12; 2 Cor. 4. 13; Eph. 4. 5; Tit. 1. 4.)

2. "Through the Divine, experimental knowledge of God and of Christ"—WESLEY.

In the knowledge (R.V.). The sphere in which alone grace and peace can be enjoyed. The word for knowledge means "full knowledge." (Dan. 4. 1; 6. 25; 1 Pet. 1. 2; Jude 2.)

3. As His Divine power has given us all things. "There is a wonderful cheerfulness in this exordium, which begins with the exhortation itself. That pertain to life and godliness—to the present, natural life, and to the continuance and increase of spiritual life. Through that Divine knowledge of Him—of Christ. Who hath called us by—His own glorious power, to eternal glory, as the end; by Christian virtue or fortitude, as the means"—WESLEY.

"The words that follow show that life must be taken in its higher sense, as extending to that eternal life which standeth in the knowledge of God. Spiritual life must exist before there can be true godliness, and the experimental knowledge of God is the first step to spiritual life. To glory and virtue (R.V. 'By His own glory and virtue'). The thought expressed is that the attributes of God manifested by Him are the means by which He calls men to the knowledge of the truth"—C. B. (John 17. 3; 1 Thess. 2. 12; 4. 7; 2 Thess. 2. 14; 2 Tim. 1. 9; 1 Pet. 2. 9; 3. 9.)

4. "Through which—glory and fortitude. He hath given us exceeding great, and inconceivably precious promises—both the promises and the things promised, which follow in their due season, that, sustained and encouraged by the promises, we may obtain all that he has promised. That having escaped the manifold corruption which is in the world—from that fruitful fountain, evil desire—ye may become partakers of the Divine nature—being renewed in the image of God, and having communion with Him, so as to dwell in God and God in you"—WESLEY.

Partakers of the Divine nature—not His essence, but His holiness, including His "glory and virtue," the opposite to corruption through lust. Sanctification is the imparting to us of God Himself, by the Holy Spirit. (2 Cor. 3. 18; 7. 1; Eph. 4. 24; Heb. 12. 10; 1 John 3. 2.)

Vers. 5–11. EXHORTATION TO GROWTH IN GRACE.—5. For this very reason—"because God hath given you so great blessings. Giving all diligence. It is a very uncommon word which we render 'giving.' It literally signifies, 'bringing in by the by,' or 'over and above'; implying that God works the work, yet not unless we are diligent. Our diligence is to follow the gift of God, and is followed by an increase of all His gifts. Add to—and in all the other gifts of God. Superadd the latter, without losing the former. The Greek word properly means 'lead up,' as in a dance, one of these after the other, in a beautiful order. Your faith — that 'evidence of things not seen,' termed before 'the knowledge of God and of Christ,' the root of all Christian graces. Courage—whereby ye may conquer all enemies and difficulties, and execute whatever faith dictates. In this most beautiful connection, each preceding grace leads to the following; each following, tempers and perfects the preceding. They are set down in the order of nature, rather than the order of time. For though every grace bears a relation to every other, yet here they are so nicely ranged, that those which have the closest dependence on each other are placed together. And to your courage knowledge—wisdom, teaching how to exercise it on all occasions"—WESLEY.

In your faith supply virtue, and in your virtue knowledge, etc. "Each grace being assumed, becomes the stepping-stone to the succeeding grace; and the latter in turn qualifies and completes the former. Faith leads the band; love brings up the rear. The fruits of faith specified are seven, the perfect number. Virtue—moral excellency, manly, strenuous energy; and in your virtue knowledge—practical discrimination of good and evil; intelligent appreciation of what is the will of God in each detail of practice"—P. (Ch. 3. 18; 1 Pet. 3. 7.)

6. And to your knowledge temperance, and to your temperance patience. "Bear and forbear; sustain and abstain; deny yourself and take up your cross daily. The more knowledge you have, the more renounce your own will; indulge yourself the less. 'Knowledge puffeth up,' and the great boasters of knowledge (the Gnostics) were those that turned the grace of God into wantonness. But see that 'your' knowledge be attended with 'temperance.' Christian temperance implies the voluntary abstaining from all pleasure which does not lead to God. It extends to all things inward and outward: the due government of every thought, as well as affection. 'It is using the world,' so to use all outward, and so to restrain all inward things, that they may become a means of what is spiritual; a scaling ladder to ascend to what is above. Intemperance is to abuse the world. He that uses anything below, looking no higher, and getting no further, is intemperate. He that uses the creature only so as to attain to more of the Creator, is alone temperate, and walks as Christ Himself walked. And to patience godliness — its proper support: a continual sense of God's presence and providence, and a filial fear of, and confidence in, Him; otherwise your patience may be pride, surliness, stoicism, but not Christianity"—WESLEY.

"The word temperance has a wider range than the modern sense of the English term. Self-control would be a better equivalent"—C. B. "To patience we must add godliness, and this is the very thing that is produced by patience, for that worketh experience. (Rom. 5. 4.) When Christians bear afflictions patiently, they get an experimental knowledge of the loving-kindness of their heavenly Father; and hereby they are brought to the childlike fear, and reverential love, wherein true godliness consists"—M. H.

7. And to godliness brotherly kindness—"no sullenness, sternness, moroseness: 'sour godliness,' so called, is of the devil. Of Christian godliness it may always be said—

Mild, sweet, serene, and tender is her mood,
Nor grave with sternness, nor with lightness free:
Against example resolutely good,
Fervent in zeal, and warm in charity.

And to brotherly kindness love—the pure and perfect love of God and of all mankind. The apostle here makes an advance upon the preceding article, 'brotherly kindness,' which seems only to relate to the love of Christians toward one another"—WESLEY.

From brotherly kindness we are to go forward to love — love one toward another (brotherly kindness), love toward men (charity). So charity completes the choir of graces in Col. 3. 14. "In a retrograde order, he who has 'love' will exercise brotherly kindness; he who has 'brotherly kindness' will feel godliness needful; the godly will mix nothing stoical with his patience; to the patient, temperance is easy; the temperate weighs things well, and so has knowledge; knowledge guards against sudden impulse, carrying away its virtue"—BENGEL. (Gal. 6. 10; 1 Thess. 3, 12; 5. 15; 1 John 4. 21.)

8. "For these being really in you—added to your faith—and abounding—increasing more and more, otherwise we fall short—make you neither slothful nor unfruitful—do not suffer you to be faint in your mind, or without fruit in your lives. If there is less faithfulness, less care and watchfulness, since we were pardoned, than there was before, and less diligence, less outward obedience, than when we were seeking remission of sin, we are both 'slothful and unfruitful in the knowledge of Christ,' that is, in the faith, which then cannot work by love"—WESLEY.

"Idle nor unfruitful unto the knowledge (R.V.). The full knowledge (Greek) of Christ is the goal towards which all these graces tend. As their subsisting in us constitutes us not barren or idle, so their abounding in us constitutes us not unfruitful in respect to it. It is through doing His will, and so becoming like Him, that we grow in the knowledge of Him. (John 7. 17)"—P. (John 15. 2; Tit. 3. 14.)

9. But he that wanteth these—"that does not add them to his faith—is blind—the eyes of his understanding are again closed. He cannot see God, or His pardoning love. He has lost the evidence of things not seen. Not able to see afar off—lit. 'purblind.' He has lost sight of the precious promises: perfect love and heaven are equally out of his sight. Nay, he cannot now see what himself once enjoyed. Having, as it were, forgot the purification from his former sins—scarce knowing what he himself then felt, when his sins were forgiven"—WESLEY.

For he that lacketh these things (R.V.) is blind, seeing only what is near. The word "for" indicates the connection. We are to press on from one point to another in the knowledge of Christ,—because, if we do not press onward, we sink into a want of power to perceive the elementary truths of religion. The man in this state sees the near things of his daily life, but has lost the power to look to the far-off things of the life eternal. Hath forgotten. The continually present sense of our sins having been forgiven through the blood of Christ, is the strongest stimulant to every grace. (1 John 2. 9, 11; Eph. 5. 26; Heb. 9. 14; 1 John 1. 7.)

10. Wherefore—"considering the miserable state of these apostates—brethren. S. Peter nowhere uses this appellation in either of his Epistles, but in this important exhortation—be the more diligent—by courage, knowledge, temperance, etc.—to make your calling and election firm. God hath called you by His word and His Spirit; He hath elected you, separated you from the world, through sanctification of the Spirit. Oh cast not away these inestimable benefits! If ye are thus diligent to make your election firm, ye shall never finally fall"—WESLEY.

Never stumble (R.V.). To make your calling and election sure. "The ensuring of our election is not spoken of in respect to God, but in respect to our part. There is no uncertainty on His part, but on ours the only security is our faith in His promise, producing the fruits of the Spirit"—P. "Calling and election were, in S. Peter's view, the conditions of a covenant offered by God's mercy, and it rested with man to rescind or to ratify the compact"—C. B. (1 John 3. 19; ch. 3. 17.)

11. "For if ye do so, an entrance shall be ministered to you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom—ye shall go in full triumph to glory"—WESLEY.

Shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance (R.V.). The verb is the same as in ver. 5. Minister, supply, in your faith virtue and the other graces, so shall there be "ministered," "supplied" to you the entrance into that heaven where these graces shine most brightly. The reward of grace hereafter corresponds with the work of grace here.

Vers. 12–21. THE APOSTLE'S FAITHFUL TESTIMONY.—12. Wherefore — "since everlasting destruction attends your sloth, everlasting glory your diligence, I will not neglect always to remind you of these things—therefore he wrote another, so soon after the former, Epistle. Though ye are established in the present truth—that truth which I am now declaring"—WESLEY.

The truth that is with you (R.V.). Always—implying the reason why he writes the Second Epistle so soon after the first. He feels that there is likely to be more and more need of admonition on account of the increasing corruption. The present truth—the gospel truth now present with you: formerly promised to Old Testament believers, now in the New Testament actually present with and in believers, so that they are established in it. (Rom. 15. 14, 15; Phil. 3. 1; ch. 3. 1; 1 John 2. 21; Jude 5; 1 Pet. 5. 12; ch. 3. 17.)

13. In this tabernacle—"or tent. How short is our abode in the body! How easily does a believer pass out of it!"—WESLEY.

This tabernacle. "The term is interesting—(1) as parallel to S. Paul's use of the same imagery in 2 Cor. 5. 1; and (2) as connected with the reference to the Transfiguration which follows. It will be remembered that, in that vision, S. Peter had said, 'Let us make three tabernacles' (Matt. 17. 4); he had now learned that the true tabernacle of Christ was His human body, and to think of his own body also as the tabernacle of His Spirit"—C. B. (2 Cor. 5. 1, 4; ch. 3. 1.)

14. Even as the Lord Jesus showed me—in the manner which He foretold (John 21. 18, etc.) It is not improbable, He had also showed him that the time was now drawing nigh"—WESLEY.

The putting off of my tabernacle cometh swiftly (R.V.). We have the two closely associated ideas of a tent and a garment, as in

2 Cor. 5. 1, 3. Hath showed (R.V.) "signified," the tense intimating a definite time. (Deut. 4. 21, 22; 31. 14; 2 Tim. 4. 6; John 21. 18, 19.)

15. That ye may be able—"by having this Epistle among you"—WESLEY.

Decease. In the word employed, lit. "Exodus," we have another coincidence with the story of the Transfiguration. The word does not appear, as a synonym for death, in older Greek writers. These evidently undesigned coincidences of language confirm S. Peter's authorship of the Epistle. The gradation in this passage is beautiful. "He proposed to put the brethren in remembrance of some revealed truths, with which they were already acquainted; he proposed to do this, not once or twice, but always, as long as he lived—nay, he proposed, by leaving this written testimony among them, to put them in remembrance of these things after his death. Wherefore, the ministers of the gospel ought to insist most upon the things that are of most importance to their people, although they are already well acquainted with them, the influence of truth depending, not on the knowledge, but on the frequent recollection of it" —M'K.

16. "These things are worthy to be always had in remembrance—for they are not cunningly devised fables—like those common among the heathens. While we made known to you the power and coming—that is, the powerful coming of Christ in glory. But if what they advanced of Christ was not true, if it was of their own invention, then to impose such a lie on the world, as it was, in the very nature of things, above all human power to defend, and to do this at the expense of life and all things, only to enrage the whole world, Jews and Gentiles, against them, was no cunning, but was the greatest folly that men could have been guilty of. But were eyewitnesses of His majesty—at His transfiguration, which was a specimen of His glory at the last day"—WESLEY.

Fables—as the heathen mythologies, and the subsequent Gnostic "fables and genealogies," of which the germs already existed in the junction of Judaism with Oriental philosophy in Asia Minor. The word is a prophetic protest against the rationalistic theory of the gospel history being myth. We made known unto you. He was one of the apostles, whose testimony had reached the whole Church. The coming. The word always refers to the second coming, not the first. Eyewitnesses of His majesty. The word was used for the initiated spectators of the mysteries among the heathen. The word "His" is somewhat emphatic. (1 Cor. 1. 17; 2. 1, 4; 2 Cor. 2. 17; 4. 2; Matt. 17. 1, 2; Mark 9. 2; John 1. 14; 1 John 1. 1; 4. 14.)

17. "For he received Divine honour and inexpressible glory—shining from heaven above the brightness of the sun—when there came such a voice from the excellent glory—that is, from God the Father"—WESLEY.

From the excellent glory—lit. "by the magnificent glory"—that is, "by God." This is My beloved Son. The words are given, with one slight variation not perceptible in the English, as we find them in Matt. 17. 5. It is obvious that we have here a testimony of great value to the truth of the gospel records; and as there is no reference to any written record, and as S. Peter omits the words "Hear ye Him," which S. Matthew adds, the testimony has distinctly the character of independence. If the story were based on the written records, it is at least probable that the words would have been given in the precise form in which they appear in one or other of the Gospels. The accounts, in their present form, corroborate each other. (Matt. 3. 17; 17. 5; Mark 1. 11; 9. 7; Luke 3. 22; 9. 35.)

18. And we—"Peter, James, and John. S. John was still alive. Being with Him in the holy mount—made so by that glorious manifestation, as Mount Horeb was of old (Ex. 3. 4, 5)"—WESLEY.

We—emphatic. Which came from heaven—Greek, "We heard borne from heaven." The language appears to assume that his readers already had some knowledge of the fact alluded to. (Ex. 3. 5; Josh. 5. 15; Matt. 17. 6.)

19. And we. "S. Peter here speaks in the name of all Christians—have the word of prophecy—the words of Moses, Isaiah, and all the prophets, are one and the same word, every way consistent with itself. S. Peter does not cite any particular passage, but speaks of their entire testimony. More confirmed—by that display of His glorious majesty. To which word ye do well that ye take heed, as to a lamp which shown in a dark place—wherein there was neither light nor window. Such anciently was the whole world, except that little spot where this lamp shone. Till the day should dawn—till the full light of the gospel should break through the darkness. As is the difference between the light of a lamp and that of the day, such is that between the light of the Old Testament and of the New. And the morning star—Jesus Christ (Rev. 22. 16)—arise in your hearts—be revealed in you"—WESLEY.

And we have the word of prophecy made more sure (R.V.). The correction is important; the A.V. would seem to imply that "the word of prophecy" is more sure than the voice of God Himself at the Transfiguration, which is plainly not the fact. Evidently the meaning is, "We, in these days, have the word of prophecy confirmed." Prophecy assures us that Christ's sufferings, now past, are to be followed by Christ's glory, still future; and the fulfilment of prophecy so far makes us surer of what is yet to be fulfilled, while in the Transfiguration we have already seen a type of the coming glory. The daystar arise in your hearts. The words point to a direct manifestation of CHRIST to the soul of the believer, as being higher than even the prophetic word. Christ arising in the heart, by the Holy Spirit giving full assurance, creates spiritually full day in the heart, the means to which is "giving heed to the word." (Ps. 119. 105; John 5. 35; Rev. 2. 28; 22. 16; 2 Cor. 4. 4, 6.)

20. "Ye do well, as knowing this, that no Scripture prophecy is of private interpretation—it is not any man's own word. It is God, not the prophet himself, who thereby interprets things till then unknown" —WESLEY.

"The apostle calls on men to give heed to the prophetic word, on the ground that no prophecy, authenticated as such by being recognised as Scripture, comes by the prophet's own interpretation of the facts with which he has to deal. It is borne to him, as he proceeds to show in the next verse, from a higher source"—C. B. ALFORD translates springs not out of human interpretation, that is, "is not a prognostication made by a man, knowing what he means when he utters it." Archbishop WHATELY paraphrases the passage, "We have the word of prophecy confirmed by the event fulfilling it; for no prophecy is to be interpreted by the words themselves in which it is written, but by the event; for it came not by man's device (if men had been left to their own judgment, they would have probably foretold things quite plainly); but prophets spake as they were moved by the Spirit of God (whose decree was that the clear and full understanding of the predictions should not take place at the time when they were uttered)." (Rom. 12. 6.)

21. For prophecy came not of old by the will of man—"of any mere man whatever—but the holy men of God—devoted to Him, and set apart by Him for that purpose—spake and wrote—being moved—lit. 'carried.' They were purely passive therein"—WESLEY.

For no prophecy ever came by the will of man, but men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost (R.V.). (2 Tim. 3. 16; 1 Pet. 1. 11; 2 Sam. 23. 2; Luke 1. 70; Acts 1. 16; 3. 18.)

CHAPTER II.

Vers. 1-22. WARNING AGAINST FALSE TEACHERS.—1. But there were false prophets also—"as well as true—among the people—of Israel. Those that spake even the truth, when God had not sent them; and also those that were truly sent of Him, and yet corrupted or softened their message, were false prophets. As there shall be false—as well as true—teachers among you, who will privately bring in—into the Church—destructive heresies. They first, by denying the Lord, introduced destructive heresies, that is, divisions; or they occasioned first these divisions, and then were given up to a reprobate mind, even to deny the Lord that bought them. Either the heresies are the effect of denying the Lord, or the denying the Lord was the consequence of the heresies. Even denying—both by their doctrine and their works—the Lord that bought them—with His own blood. Yet these very men perish everlastingly. Therefore Christ bought even them that perish"—WESLEY.

"The section of the Epistle which now opens presents so many parallelisms with the Epistle of S. Jude that it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that one was derived from the other, or both from a common source"—C. B. Privily bring in—not at first openly and directly, but by the way, bringing in error by the side of the true doctrine—damnable heresies (R.V. "Destructive heresies," margin, "sects of perdition"). The Lord that bought them (R.V. "the Master that bought them"). The word signifies literally, a master as contrasted with a slave. (1 Tim. 6. 1, 2.) It is used of Christ in Acts 4. 24; Rev. 6. 10; and Jude 4. Here the choice of the word was probably determined by the connection with the idea of purchase, as a master buys a slave. So we read, "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price." Here, as there, the price referred to is the precious blood of Christ, and the universality of the redemption could not be more plainly declared. (Deut. 13. 11; Matt. 24. 11; Acts 20. 30; 1 Cor. 11. 19; 1 Tim. 4. 1; 2 Tim. 3. 1, 5; 1 John 4. 1; Jude 18, 4; 1 Cor. 6. 20; Gal. 3. 13; Eph. 1. 7; Heb. 10. 29; 1 Pet. 1. 18; Rev. 5. 9; Phil. 3. 19.)

2. Their pernicious ways (R.V. "their lascivious doings"). "False doctrine and immoral practice, in the Church, often go together"—P. The way of truth will be evil spoken of—"by those who blend all false and true Christians together"—WESLEY.

3. They will make merchandise of you—"only use you to gain by you, as merchants do their wares—whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not—was long ago determined, and will be executed speedily. All sinners are adjudged to destruction; and God's punishing some proves He will punish the rest"—WESLEY.

Damnation (R.V. "destruction.") The writer personifies; judgment does not loiter, destruction does not sleep. Both are eager and ready, waiting the appointed hour. (Rom. 16. 18; 2 Cor. 12. 17, 18; 1 Tim. 6. 5; Tit. 1. 11; 2 Cor. 2. 17; ch. 1. 16; Deut. 32. 35; Jude 4, 15.)

4. Cast them down to hell—"the bottomless pit, a place of unknown misery. Delivered them—like condemned criminals to safe custody, as if bound with the strongest chains in a dungeon of darkness, to be reserved unto the judgment of the great day. Though still those chains do not hinder their often walking up and down seeking whom they may devour"—WESLEY.

Chains of darkness (R.V. "pits of darkness"). If God in time past has punished the ungodly, and saved His people, He will be sure to do so also in our days. Angels. The highest of intelligent creatures were not spared when they sinned. "The nature of the angels' sin is not specified. We may either think of a rebellion of angels headed by Satan, such as Milton has represented in Paradise Lost, or of the degradation of their spiritual nature by sensual lust, as in Gen. 6. 2"—C. B. The difficulty is created by the parallel passage in S. Jude, which appears to compare the sin of the angels with that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Hell—"Tartarus," a word not elsewhere found either in the New Testament or in the LXX. (Job 4. 18; Jude 6; John 8. 44; 1 John 3. 8; Luke 8. 31; Rev. 20. 2, 3.)

5. And spared not the old, "the antediluvian, world, but he preserved Noah the eighth person—that is, Noah and seven others, a preacher, as well as practiser, of righteousness. Bringing a flood on the world of the ungodly—whose numbers stood them in no stead"—WESLEY.

A preacher of righteousness—lit. "a herald," as if, like Jonah, he uttered some well-known proclamation which became associated with his name. A contrast is implied between the world of the ungodly and the few that were saved, teaching the awful and inflexible justice of God. (Gen. 7. 1, 7, 23; Heb. 11. 7; 1 Pet. 3. 19, 20; ch. 3. 6.)

6. Sodom and Gomorrah—an example. "S. Peter does not see in the destruction of the cities of the plain an exception to the normal order of the Divine government. It was rather a pattern instance of the judgment sure to fall, sooner or later, on all who were guilty of like sins. It may be noted that that destruction had been used as an illustration by the older prophets (Isa. 1. 9, 10; Ezek. 16. 48–56) as well as by our Lord"—C. B. (Gen. 19. 24; Deut. 29. 23; Jude 7; Num. 26. 10.)

7. Vexed with the filthy conversation—(R.V. "Sore distressed by the lascivious life"). The A.V. uses "conversation" in the sense of "conduct." The wicked—lit. "the lawless," setting at defiance the laws of nature, as well as those of God and man. (Gen. 19. 16.)

8. Vexed His righteous soul—lit. as R.V. margin, "tormented." The words refer to the pain suffered by a man of sensitive moral nature at the sight and report of the flagrant evil. Compare Ezekiel's language as to those who "sigh and cry" for the abominations done in Jerusalem. The character is the opposite of that described in Rom. 1. 32. (Ps. 119. 139, 158; Ezek. 9. 4.)

9. "It plainly appears, from these instances, that the Lord knoweth, hath both wisdom and power and will, to deliver the godly out of all temptations, and to punish the ungodly"—WESLEY.

To keep the unrighteous under punishment unto the day of judgment (R.V.). Temptations—trials of all kinds. (Ps. 34. 17, 19; 1 Cor. 10, 13.)

10. Chiefly them that walk after the flesh—"corrupt nature; particularly in the lust of uncleanness—and despise government—the authority of their governors. Dignities—persons in authority"—WESLEY.

The lust of defilement (R.V.). The apostle seems to have in view the horrible impurities which were common throughout the Roman empire. (Rom. 1. 24–28.) Dignities—lit. "glories." (See note on parallel passage in Jude 4, 7, 8, 10, 16.)

11. Whereas angels—"when they appear before the Lord (Job 1. 6; 2. 1), to give an account of what they have seen and done on the earth"—WESLEY.

Jude instances Michael. If superior angels dare not, as being in the presence of God, speak evil even of the bad angels, how awful the presumption of those who speak evil blasphemously of good "dignities," as Korah did, and Shimei. (Jude 9.)

12. "Savage as brute beasts—several of which, in the present disordered state of the world, seem born to be taken and destroyed"—WESLEY.

"In contrast to angels. In reading these terrible invectives, it must be noted that the whole context implies a depth of infamy and impurity for which no language could be too strong in condemnation"—C. B. (Jer. 12. 3; Jude 10.)

13. They count it pleasure to riot in the day time—"they glory in doing it in the face of the sun. They are spots in themselves, blemishes to any church. Sporting themselves with their own deceivings—making a jest of those whom they deceive, and even jesting while they are deceiving their own souls'—WESLEY.

Revelling in their love-feasts while they feast with you (R.V.). (See note on Jude 12.) "The 'false teachers' and their followers took their place in the company of the faithful, and instead of being content with their simple food, consisting probably of bread, fish, and vegetables (the fish are always prominent in the representations of the Agapæ in the catacombs of Rome), brought with them, it would seem, the materials for a more luxurious meal (comp. 1 Cor. 11. 21), and, as the context shows, abused the opportunities thus given for wanton glances and impure dalliance. If the A.V. reading, deceivings, be adopted, the apostle points out that in so doing they were practising a fraud on the Christian society into which they intruded themselves"—C. B. But the R.V. is more probably correct. (Phil. 3. 9; Rom. 13. 13.)

15. The way of Balaam the son of Bosor

—"so the Chaldeans pronounced what the Jews termed 'Beor'; namely, the way of covetousness. Who loved—earnestly desired, though he did not dare to take, the reward of unrighteousness—the money which Balak would have given him for cursing Israel"—WESLEY.

"This form was adopted, perhaps because the kindred word Bosor means 'flesh'; and Balaam is justly termed 'son of carnality,' as covetous, and as the enticer of Israel to lust, loved the wages of unrighteousness, and therefore wished, in order to obtain them, to curse Israel whom you had blessed, and at last gave the hellish counsel, that the only way to bring God's curse upon Israel was to entice them to fleshly lust and idolatry, which almost always go together"—P. (Num. 22. 5, 7, 21, 23, 28 ; Jude 11.)

16. The beast—"though naturally dumb"—WESLEY.

"It was not what the ass said, nor direct opposition offered in words or otherwise by the animal, but the miracle itself which forbade (R.V. 'stayed') the madness of the prophet"—W. W.

17. "Fountains and clouds promise water ; so do these promise, but do not perform"—WESLEY.

Mists driven by a storm (R.V.). "The word was probably chosen as indicating what we should call the haziness of the speculations of the false teachers"—C. B. "There being few wells and little rain in Eastern countries, for a thirsty traveller to come to a well that had no water was a great disappointment ; as it was also for the husbandman to see clouds arise which give him the promise of rain, but which, ending in a tempest, destroyed instead of refreshing the fruits of the earth"—B. (Jude 12, 13.)

18. They ensnare in the desires of the flesh—"allowing them to gratify some unholy desire. Those who were before entirely escaped from the spirit, custom, and company of them that live in error—in sin"—WESLEY.

Those who are just escaping (R.V.). Great swelling words of vanity. "Vanity is used in its proper sense of 'emptiness.' There was no substance below their show of a transcendental knowledge. Again we trace a parallel with S. Paul's language, 'knowledge puffeth up'"—C. B. (Jude 16 ; Acts 2. 40 ; ch. 1. 4 ; ver. 20.)

19. While they promise them liberty—"from needless restraints and scruples, from the bondage of the Law. Themselves are slaves of corruption—even sin, the vilest of all bondage"—WESLEY.

"We have here the characteristic feature of the teaching which S. Peter condemns. It offered freedom from the restraints which the Council of Jerusalem had imposed alike on participation in idolatrous feasts and on sins of impurity. (Acts 15. 29.) That this was the keynote of their claims, we have distinct indication in S. Paul's teaching on the same subject. This question, 'Am I not free' (1 Cor. 9. 1), his condemnation of those who boasted of their 'right' (liberty in the English version) to eat things sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 8. 9), who proclaimed that all things were 'lawful' for them (1 Cor. 10. 23), show that this was the watchword of the party of licence at Corinth ; and the language of S. Peter, though coloured with the feeling of a burning indignation against the later developments of the system, is in substance but the echo of that of his brother apostle. In his contrast between the boast of liberty and the actual bondage to corruption, we may trace a reproduction of our Lord's teaching in John 8. 34, and of S. Paul's in Rom. 6. 16"—C. B. (Gal. 5. 13 ; 1 Pet. 2. 16.)

20. For if after they—"who are thus ensnared—have escaped the pollutions of the world—the sins which pollute all who know not God—through the knowledge of Christ—that is, through faith in Him. (2 Pet. 1. 3.) They are again entangled therein, and overcome, their last state is worse than the first—more inexcusable, and causing a greater damnation"—WESLEY.

Entangled and overcome. "When men are once entangled, they are easily overcome ; therefore should men keep close to the word of God, and shun those who seek to perplex and bewilder them"—M'K. The last state is worse than the first—evidently quoted from the Master's own words in Matt. 12. 45. S. Peter regarded the spiritual condition of these men as a fulfilment of them. (Luke 11. 26 ; Heb. 6. 4 ; 10. 26, 27 ; ch. 1. 4 ; ver. 18 ; ch. 1. 2.)

21. The commandment—"the whole Law of God, once, not only delivered to their ears, but written in their hearts"—WESLEY.

"The apostle sets himself to prove that a state of apostasy is worse than a state of ignorance, for this is a condemning of the way of righteousness, after they have had some knowledge of it, and expressed some liking to it ; this carries in it a declaring that they have found some iniquity in the way of righteousness, and some falsehood in the word of truth"—M'K. (Luke 12. 47, 48 ; John 9. 41 ; 15. 22.)

22. The dog : the sow—"such are all men in the sight of God, before they receive His grace, and after they have made shipwreck of faith"—WESLEY.

Another of S. Peter's informal quotations of the Old Testament. He employs the language of Scripture much as Christian people use it now, without regard to literal accuracy. "You need not wonder at the event, for dogs and swine they were before, and dogs and swine they will continue. They scarcely have escaped from their filthy folly when they are again entangled in it. S. Peter often quoted Proverbs in his First Epistle (ch. 1. 7; 2. 17; 4. 8, 18), another proof that both Epistles came from the same writer"—P. (Prov. 26. 11.)

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1. THE CERTAINTY OF THE SECOND ADVENT.—1. This Second Epistle. The Second Epistle, though more general in its address, yet included especially the same persons as the First Epistle was more particularly addressed to. Pure minds (R.V. "sincere")—lit. "pure when examined by sunlight," opposite to "having the understanding darkened." (Eph. 4. 18; ch. 1. 13.)

2, 3. "Be the more mindful thereof, because ye know scoffers will come first—before the Lord comes—walking after their own evil desires—here is the origin of the error, the root of libertinism. Do we not see this eminently fulfilled?"—WESLEY.

R.V., following the better MSS. with an overwhelming weight of authority, gives through your apostles, for "of us the apostles." The reading gives special interest to the words. They are a distinct recognition, like that in 1 Pet. 5. 12, and here in ver. 15, of the apostleship of S. Paul and his fellow-workers. Scoffers—their very scoffing confirms the truth of the prediction. (Jude 17; 1 Tim. 4. 1; 2 Tim. 3. 1; Jude 18; ch. 2. 10.)

4. Saying, Where is the promise of His coming—"to judgment (they do not even deign to name Him). We see no sign of any such thing. For ever since the fathers—our first ancestors—fell asleep, all things—heaven, water, earth—continue as they were from the beginning of the creation—without any such material change as might make us believe they will ever end"—WESLEY.

"The length of the interval gives occasion for the scoff of the unbeliever, and exercises the patience of the saints. All things, the existence and motion of the heavenly bodies, the succession of the seasons, the revolutions of day and night, every part of creation, which undergoes no visible change. It is clear that the expectation of Christ's second advent was connected with that of the change or dissolution of all things visible"—W. W. (Isa. 5. 19; Jer. 17. 15; Ezek. 12. 22, 27; Matt. 24. 48; Luke 12. 45.)

5. For this they are willingly ignorant of—"they do not care to know or consider—that by the almighty word of God—which bounds the duration of all things, so that it cannot be either longer or shorter—of old—before the flood—the aerial heavens were, and the earth—not as it is now, but standing out of the water and in the water—perhaps the interior globe of earth was fixed 'in the' midst of the great deep, the abyss of 'water'; the shell or exterior globe 'standing out of the water,' covering the great deep. This, or some other great and manifest difference between the original and present constitution of the terraqueous globe, seems then to have been so generally known that S. Peter charges their ignorance of it totally upon their wilfulness"—WESLEY.

That there were heavens from of old, and an earth compacted out of water and amidst water, by the word of God (R.V.). "That is, having been in a fluid state, and continuing to be surrounded and filled with fluid. These mockers forgot the history of the creation and the deluge. The word of God caused the earth to appear out of the waters (Gen. 1. 9); water is an element in the construction of the earth, and yet, by the appointment of God, became the means of its destruction"—W. W. (Gen. 1. 6, 9; Ps. 33. 6; Heb. 11. 3; Ps. 24. 2; 136. 6; Col. 1. 17.)

6. Through which—"heaven and earth, the windows of heaven being opened, and the fountains of the great deep broken up—the world that then was—the whole antediluvian race—being overflowed with water, perished—and the heavens and earth themselves, though they did not perish, yet underwent a great change. So little ground have these scoffers for saying that all things continue as they were from the creation"—WESLEY.

By which means (R.V.), "that is, by the waters from the heaven and the earth, when the fountains of the great deep were broken up and the windows of heaven opened"—W. W. The apostle speaks from the standpoint of the physical science of his time; the commentator can only do the same. The suggestions so cautiously expressed in Mr. Wesley's note on ver. 5 will not be accepted by the scientist of the present day. But the apostle's argument is clear and unanswerable. The law of continuity, on which such stress was laid, had not been without exception. There had been a great catastrophe in the past. There might be a yet greater one in the future. (Gen. 7. 11, 21-23; ch. 2. 5.)

7. But the heavens and the earth that are now—"since the flood. Are reserved unto fire at the day wherein God will judge the world, and punish the ungodly with everlasting destruction"—WESLEY.

Stored up for fire (margin, "stored with fire") being reserved (R.V.). "By analogy with ver. 5 we understand that the fire for which the present heavens and earth are reserved exists now as a constituent in their original condition, but prepared and designed as the agent of their dissolution"—W. W. Reserved—it is only God's watchful providence which holds together the present state of things until His time for ending it. (Ver. 10; Matt. 25. 41; 2 Thess. 1. 8.)

8. But be not ye ignorant—"whatever they are—of this one thing—which casts much light on the point in hand—that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day—Moses had said (Ps. 90. 4), 'A thousand years in Thy sight are as one day'; which S. Peter applies with regard to the last day, so as to denote both His eternity, whereby He exceeds all measure of time in His essence and in His operation; His knowledge, to which all things past or to come are present every moment; His power, which needs no long delay, in order to bring its work to perfection; and His long-suffering, which excludes all impatience of expectation, and desire of making haste. 'One day is with the Lord as a thousand years'—that is, in one day, in one moment, He can do the work of a thousand years. Therefore He 'is not slow'—He is always equally ready to fulfil His promise. 'And a thousand years are as one day'—that is, no delay is long to God. A thousand years are as one day to the eternal God. Therefore 'He is long-suffering': He gives us space for repentance, without any inconvenience to Himself. In a word, with God time passes neither slower nor swifter than is suitable to Him and His economy; nor can there be any reason why it should be necessary for Him either to delay or hasten the end of all things. How can we comprehend this? If we could comprehend it, S. Peter needed not to have added, 'with the Lord'"—WESLEY.

"Not that God does not perceive any difference between one day and a thousand years; but that these differences do not affect His designs, or actions, or felicity, as they do those of finite creatures. What He brings to pass on the day He declares His purpose, is not more certain than what He will bring to pass a thousand years after such declaration"—B. (Ps. 90. 4.)

9. The Lord is not slow—"as if the time fixed for it were past—concerning His promise, which shall surely be fulfilled in its season—by His long-suffering toward us—children of men—not willing that any soul which He hath made should perish"—WESLEY.

The third answer rests upon the purpose of what men regarded as delay in the fulfilment of the promise. That purpose was one of love and mercy. It was not tardiness or slowness, but long-suffering. "We note, as an evidence of identity of authorship, the recurrence of the thought we found in 1 Pet. 3. 20. The long-suffering, which waited a hundred and twenty years while the ark was preparing, is exhibited again in the interval between the first and the second comings of Christ"—C. B. (Hab. 2. 3; Heb. 10. 37; Isa. 30. 18; 1 Pet. 3. 20; ver. 15; Ezek. 18. 23, 32; 33. 11; Rom. 2. 4; 1 Tim. 2. 4.)

10. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief—"suddenly, unexpectedly—in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise—surprisingly expressed by the very sound of the original word. The elements shall melt with fervent heat. 'The elements' seem to mean, the sun, moon, and stars; not the four commonly so called; for air and water cannot melt, and the earth is mentioned immediately after. The earth and all the works—whether of nature or art—that are therein shall be burned up. And has not God already abundantly provided for this? —(1) By the stores of subterranean fire which are so frequently bursting out at Ætna, Vesuvius, Hecla, and many other burning mountains; (2) by the ethereal (vulgarly called electrical) fire, diffused through the whole globe, which, if the secret chain that now binds it up were loosed, would immediately dissolve the whole frame of nature"—WESLEY.

Will come—emphatical—in spite of the mockers, notwithstanding the delay—as a thief. S. Peter remembers and repeats his Lord's image (Luke 12. 39, 41) used in the conversation in which he took a part. He declares the certainty, the suddenness, and the overwhelming issues of the second coming. Compare a like picture of the end of the world's history in Rev. 20. 11; 21. 1. (Matt. 24. 43; Luke 12. 39; 1 Thess. 5. 2; Rev. 3. 3; 16. 15; Ps. 102. 26; Isa. 51. 6; Matt. 24. 35; Mark 13. 31; Rom. 8. 20; Heb. 1. 11.)

11. Seeing then that all these things are dissolved—"to the eye of faith it appears as done already. 'All these things'—mentioned before; all that are included in that scriptural expression, 'the heavens and the earth'; that is, the universe. What persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation—with men. And godliness—toward your Creator"—WESLEY.

What manner of persons—"how serious, how watchful, how free from levity and folly, how unmoved by the trifling changes which are now continually occurring, the comparatively insignificant losses and gains, honour and reproach, pleasure and pain! How heavenly-minded, having our thoughts and affections set upon that world, with its riches, glories, and joys, which is durable and eternal"—B. (1 Pet. 1. 15.)

12. Hastening on—"as it were by your earnest desires and fervent prayers. The coming of the day of God—many myriads of days He grants to men: one, the last, is the day of God Himself"—WESLEY.

Earnestly desiring (R.V.). "Not that God's eternal appointment of the time is changeable, but God appoints us as instruments of accomplishing those events which must be first before the day of God can come. By praying for His coming, and by furthering the preaching of the gospel for a witness to all nations, we hasten the coming of the day of God. Christ says, 'Surely I come quickly. Amen.' Our part is to speed forward this consummation by continually praying, 'Even so; come, Lord Jesus'"—P. (1 Cor. 1. 7; Tit. 1. 13; Ps. 50. 3; Isa. 34. 4; Micah 1. 4; ver. 10.)

13. We look for new heavens and a new earth—"raised as it were out of the ashes of the old; we look for an entire new state of things—wherein dwelleth righteousness—only righteous spirits. How great a mystery!"—WESLEY.

According to His promise—"the promise of which the apostle speaks is that of Isa. 65. 17; 66. 22, where we have the very words, 'new heavens and a new earth,' the context there connecting it with the restoration of Israel to their own land, and the renewed glory of Jerusalem. The same hope shows itself in the visions of the Apocalypse. (Rev. 21. 1.) Wherein dwelleth righteousness. This, again, reproduces the thought of Isaiah (ch. 65. 26), that 'they shall not hurt' (LXX. 'act unrighteously') 'nor destroy in all my holy mountain,' and S. John's account of the New Jerusalem, that 'there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth' (Rev. 21. 27)"—C. B. "This cannot be the new creation of which Isaiah speaks, for from this sin and death must be excluded. The words heaven and earth do not require a more exact correspondence to things present, than the words 'house,' 'building' (2 Cor. 5. 1). The Holy Ghost makes use of words with which we are familiar, to represent to our minds things to come"—W. W.

THE FINAL EXHORTATION.—14. "Labour that, whenever He cometh, ye may be found in peace—may meet Him without terror, being sprinkled with His blood, and sanctified by His Spirit, so as to be without spot and blameless"—WESLEY.

Blameless in His sight (R.V.). In peace—in all its aspects, towards God, your own conscience, and your fellow-men, and as its consequence eternal blessedness. The exhortation is an echo from the Master's teaching. (Matt. 24. 46.) The words without spot and blameless are nearly identical with those describing Christ "as a lamb without blemish and without spot." Those who expect the coming of Christ should be like Him in their lives. (1 Cor. 1. 8; 15. 58; Phil. 1. 10; 1 Thess. 3. 13; 5. 23.)

15. And account the long-suffering of the Lord salvation—"not only designed to lead men to repentance, but actually conducing thereto: a precious means of saving many more souls. As our beloved brother Paul also hath written to you. This refers not only to the single sentence preceding, but to all that went before. S. Paul had written to the same effect, concerning the end of the world, in several parts of his Epistles, and particularly in his Epistle to the Hebrews"—WESLEY.

The long-suffering of our Lord—connected with vers. 9, 18, shows the full participation of the Son in the counsels of the Father. Paul hath written (R.V. "wrote"). "The tense agrees with the idea that S. Peter had some particular Epistle in his mind. Some think that 1 Thess. 4. 13 to 5. 11 is referred to"—W. W. (Rom. 2. 4; 1 Pet. 3. 20; ver. 9.)

16. As also in all his Epistles. "S. Peter wrote this a little before his own and S. Paul's martyrdom. S. Paul therefore had now written all his Epistles; and even from this expression we may learn that S. Peter had read them all, perhaps sent to him by S. Paul himself. Nor was he at all disgusted by what S. Paul had written concerning him in the Epistle to the Galatians. Speaking of these things—namely, of the coming of our Lord, delayed through His long-suffering, and of the circumstances preceding and accompanying it. Which things the unlearned — they who are not taught of God—and the unstable—wavering, double-minded, unsettled men. Wrest — as though Christ would not come—as they do also the other scriptures—therefore S. Paul's writings were now part of the scriptures—to their own destruction. But that some use the scriptures ill, is no reason why others should not use them at all"—WESLEY.

"The Pauline Epistles were by this time become the common property of all the Churches. The all seems to imply they were now completed. Hard to be understood. When religion is studied as a science, nothing is more abstruse; when studied in order to know our duty, and practise it, nothing is easier. Other scriptures. S. Paul's Epistles were, therefore, by this time recognised in the Church as 'scriptures,' a term never applied, in any of the fifty places where it occurs, save to the Old and New Testament sacred writings. Men in each church having miraculous discernment of spirits prevented any uninspired writing being put on a par with the Old Testament Word of God; the apostles' lives were also providentially prolonged, so that fraud in the canon is out of question. The three first Gospels and the Acts are included in the 'other Scriptures,' and perhaps all the New Testament books, save John and Revelation, written later"—P. To their own destruction. Probably the unlearned and unstable claimed S. Paul as their teacher, in eating things sacrificed to idols, and indulging in sins of impurity. (See note ch. 2. 19.) Perhaps they justified a profligate Antinomianism, as others have done, by wresting his doctrine of justification by faith. (Rom. 8. 19; 1 Cor. 5. 24; 1 Thess. 4. 15.)

17. "Seeing ye know these things before. One great purpose for which prophets were inspired to foretell the corruptions which were to arise in the Church, and the evils which were to befall the sincere disciples of Christ, was to put them on their guard against these corruptions, and to arm them with fortitude to bear persecution. Fall from your own steadfastness. The steadfastness of the readers of the Epistle, as contrasted with the 'unstable' or 'unsteadfast' of ver. 16, is acknowledged; but they are warned that it needs care and watchfulness to preserve it. He does not assume unconditional perseverance. The tense of the verb in 'lest ye fall' indicates that it would be a single and decisive act"—C. B. (Mark 13. 23; ch. 1. 12; Eph. 4. 14; ch. 1. 10, 11; 2. 18.)

18. But grow in grace—"that is, in every Christian temper. There may be, for a time, grace without growth, as there may be natural life without growth. But such sickly life, of soul or body, will end in death, and every day draw nigher to it. Health is the means of both natural and spiritual growth. If the remaining evil of our fallen nature be not daily mortified, it will, like an evil humour in the body, destroy the whole man. But if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body (only so far as we do this), ye shall live the life of faith, holiness, happiness. The end and design of grace being purchased and bestowed on us, is to destroy the image of the earthly, and restore us to that of the heavenly. And so far as it does this, it truly profits us; and also makes way for more of the heavenly gift, that we may at last be filled with all the fulness of God. The strength and well-being of a Christian depend on what his soul feeds on, as the health of the body depends on whatever we make our daily food. If we feed on what is according to our nature, we grow; if not, we pine away and die. The soul is of the nature of God, and nothing but what is according to His holiness can agree with it. Sin, of every kind, starves the soul, and makes it consume away. Let us not try to invert the order of God in His new creation: we shall only deceive ourselves. It is easy to forsake the will of God, and follow our own; but this will bring leanness into the soul. It is easy to satisfy ourselves without being possessed of the holiness and happiness of the gospel. It is easy to call these frames and feelings, and then to oppose faith to one and Christ to the other. Frames (allowing the expression) are no other than heavenly tempers, 'the mind that was in Christ.' Feelings are the Divine consolations of the Holy Ghost shed abroad in the heart of him that truly believes. And wherever faith is, and wherever Christ is, there are these blessed frames and feelings. If they are not in us, it is a sure sign that though the wilderness became a pool, the pool is become a wilderness again. And in the knowledge of Christ—that is, in faith the root of all. To Him be the glory to the day of eternity—an expression naturally flowing from that sense which the apostle had felt in his soul throughout this whole chapter. Eternity is a day, without night, without interruption, without end"—WESLEY.

Grow in the grace and knowledge (R.V.). "Not only do not fall from, but grow onward; the true secret of not going backward. The grace and knowledge of Christ. The 'grace' of which Christ is the author, and the 'knowledge' of which Christ is the object"—P. "The final thought of the Epistle, like that with which it opens, is the growth of the Christian life. The absence of salutations, such as those with which the First Epistle ended, may be in part due to the fact that this Epistle is not addressed to any particular church, or group of churches, but to the Christian world. The apostle was content that his last words should be, on the one hand, an earnest entreaty that men should 'grow' to completeness in their spiritual life, and, on the other, the ascription of eternal glory to the Master whom he loved"—C. B. (Eph. 4. 15; 1 Pet. 2. 2; 2 Tim. 4. 18; Rev. 1. 6.)

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN.

MR. WESLEY, in the subjoined analysis, has called this book "a tract." There is nothing epistolary in the method either of its commencement or its close.

Internal evidence, corroborated by the unbroken testimony of Christian antiquity, assures us that it was written by John, the Apostle and Evangelist; and the constant allusions to the language of the Fourth Gospel render it probable that it was written at about the same time, or a little later. The persons, or churches, for whom it was intended, and the immediate purpose it was designed to serve, can only be the subjects of uncertain conjecture. But it is evident that the Gnostic heresy, which prevailed so widely not long afterwards, had already begun to trouble the Church. Repeated allusion will be found in the following notes to this long-perished system of "philosophy, falsely so called." Under the guidance of the Spirit of Inspiration, the statements of Christian doctrine, and the descriptions of Christian life, which were called forth by the conflict of the day, were, in this case, as well as in many others, made profitable to the Church in all ages.

The style is characteristic of S. John. Employing language of an almost infantile simplicity, he presents the profoundest truths concerning the Divine nature, and the great work of human redemption.

"THE PARTS OF IT ARE THREE—

I. The Preface, ... Chap. i. 1-4.
II. The Tract itself, ... ,, i., v. 5-12.
III. The Conclusion, ... ,, ,, 13-31.

In the Preface he shows the authority of his own preaching and writing, and expressly points out the design of his present writing. To the Preface exactly answers the Conclusion, more largely explaining the same design.

THE TRACT ITSELF HAS TWO PARTS, TREATING—

I. Severally—
1. Of communion with the Father, ... Chap. i. 5-10.
2. Of communion with the Son, with a distinct application to fathers, young men, and little children, and an exhortation to abide in Him, ... ,, ii. 1-12.
3. Of the confirmation and fruit of this abiding through the Spirit, ... ,, iv. 1-21.

II. Conjointly—
1. Of the testimony of the Father, Son, and Spirit; on which faith in Christ, love to God, and victory over the world, are founded, ... ,, v. 1-12."
—WESLEY.

CHAPTER I.

Vers. 1-4. THE AUTHORITY AND THE DESIGN OF THE EPISTLE.—1. That which was—"here means, He which was the Word Himself; afterwards it means, that which they had heard from Him. Which was—namely, with the Father (ver. 2), before He was manifested. From the beginning. This phrase is sometimes used in a limited sense; but here it properly means from eternity, being equivalent with 'in the beginning' (John 1. 1). That which we—the apostles—have not only heard, but seen with our eyes, which we have beheld — attentively considered on various occasions. Of the word of life. He is termed 'the Word' (John 1. 1); 'the life' (John 1. 4); as He is the living Word of God, who, with the Father and the Spirit, is the fountain of life to all creatures, particularly of spiritual and eternal life"—WESLEY.

Concerning the word of life (R.V.). "Note the climax. Seeing is more than hearing, and beholding (which requires time) is more than seeing (which may be momentary), while handling is more than all. With all the language at his command, the apostle insists on the reality of the Incarnation, of which he can speak from personal knowledge, based on the combined evidence of all the senses. The Docetic heresy of supposing that the Lord's body was unreal, and the Cerinthian heresy of supposing that He who was from the beginning was different from Him whom they had seen and handled, are authoritatively condemned by implication at the outset"—C. B. (John 1. 1; ch. 2. 13; John 1. 14; 2 Pet. 1. 16; ch. 4. 14; Luke 24. 39; John 20. 27.)

2. For the life—"the living Word—was manifested—in the flesh, to our very senses. And we testify and declare—we testify by declaring, by preaching, and writing (vers. 3, 4). Preaching lays the foundation (vers. 5-10), writing builds thereon. To you—who have not seen. The eternal life — which always was, and afterward appeared to us. This is mentioned in the beginning of the Epistle. In the end of it is mentioned the same 'eternal life,' which we shall always enjoy"—WESLEY.

In this parenthetical verse, as in vers. 1 and 3, the apostle emphatically reiterates that what he has to communicate is the result of his own personal experience. Several instances of this occur in S. John's Gospel. (John 1. 4; 11. 25; 14. 6; Rom. 16. 26; 1 Tim. 3. 16; ch. 3. 5; John 21. 24; Acts 2. 32; ch. 5. 20; John 1. 1, 2.)

3. That which we have seen and heard—"of Him and from Him—declare we to you —for this end—that ye also may have fellowship with us—may enjoy the same fellowship which we enjoy. And truly our fellowship—whereby He is in us and we in Him—is with the Father and with the Son—of the Holy Ghost he speaks afterwards"—WESLEY.

That ye also—"that being fully satisfied and firmly persuaded of the truth of our testimony, and laying hold on Him by a lively faith, ye may have fellowship with God and with Christ, such as we apostles and other faithful Christians have, and may partake with us of the benefits and privileges we enjoy thereby"—B. (Acts 4. 20; John 17. 11; 2 Cor. 1. 9; ch. 2. 24.)

4. That your joy may be full. "So our Lord also. (John 15. 11; 16. 22.) There is a joy of hope, a joy of faith, and a joy of love. Here the joy of faith is directly intended. It is a concise expression. 'Your joy'—that is, your faith and the joy arising from it; but it likewise implies the joy of hope and love"—WESLEY.

"These words apply to the whole Epistle, of which he here states the purpose, just as in John 20. 31 he states the purpose of his Gospel. The following profound thoughts struggle for expression in these four opening verses. There is a Being who has existed with God the Father from all eternity; He is the Father's Son; He is also the expression of the Father's nature and will (the Word); He has been manifested in space and in time; and of that manifestation I and others have had personal knowledge. In revealing to us the Divine nature, He becomes to us life, eternal life. We come to you with the declaration of all this in our hands, that you may unite with us in our great possession, and that our joy in the Lord may be complete"—C. B. The marginal references point out the striking identity, both in thought and language, of the Gospel and the Epistle. (John 15. 11; 16. 24; 2 John 12.)

Vers. 5–10. OF COMMUNION WITH THE FATHER.—5. "And this is the sum of the message which we have heard of Him—the Son of God—that God is light—the light of wisdom, love, holiness, glory. What light is to the natural eye, that God is to the spiritual eye—and in Him is no darkness at all—no contrary principle. He is pure, unmixed light"—WESLEY.

"The schoolmen well said that there is a fourfold darkness—of nature, of ignorance, of misery, and of sin. The symbol of light applied to God must designate perfect goodness and beauty, with blissful consciousness of it, and luminous clearness of wisdom"—E. "There are three statements in the Bible which stand alone as revelations of the nature of God, and they are all in the writings of S. John: 'God is Spirit' (John 4. 24); 'God is light,' and 'God is love' (1 John 4. 16)"—C. B. (Ch. 3. 11; John 1. 9; 8. 12; 9. 5; 12. 35, 36.)

6. If we say—"either with our tongue, or in our heart, if we endeavour to persuade either ourselves or others—we have fellowship with Him, while we walk, either inwardly or outwardly, in darkness—in sin of any kind—we do not the truth—our actions prove that the truth is not in us"—WESLEY.

As light is the symbol of wisdom and holiness, so darkness represents folly and sin. The repeated antithesis, God is light, and in Him is no darkness; we lie and do not the truth, is characteristic of S. John. The energy with which he insists on the necessity of practical holiness suggests the existence and the prevalence of a contrary opinion. The Gnostics taught that to the enlightened man all conduct was morally indifferent. (2 Cor. 6. 14; ch. 2. 4.)

7. But if we walk in the light—"in all holiness—as God is (a deeper word than 'walk,' and more worthy of God) in the light, then we may truly say, we have fellowship one with another—we who have seen, and you who have not seen, do alike enjoy that fellowship with God: the imitation of God being the only sure proof of our having fellowship with Him. And the blood of Jesus Christ His Son—with the grace purchased thereby—cleanseth us from all sin—both original and actual, taking away all the guilt and all the power"—WESLEY.

The blood of Jesus His Son (R.V.). "This word (the blood) declares more vividly than any other could do three great realities of the Christian belief: the reality of the manhood of Jesus, the reality of His sufferings, the reality of His sacrifice. Much modern criticism of hymns and sermons, where the blood of Jesus is at all appealed to, is unscriptural and rationalistic in its ultra-refinement. It is out of touch with S. Paul (Col. 1. 14–20), with the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. 9. 14), with S. Peter (1 Pet. 1. 19), with S. John in this Epistle, with the redeemed in heaven (Rev. 5. 9)"—E. His Son. Not redundant. It explains how this blood can have such virtue. Cleanseth us. The present tense of what goes on continually. "This passage shows that the gratuitous pardon of sins is given to us not once only, but is a benefit perpetually residing in the Church, and daily offered to the faithful"—CALVIN. (1 Cor. 6. 11; Eph. 1. 7; Heb. 9. 14; 1 Pet. 1. 19; ch. 2. 2; Rev. 1. 5.)

8. If we say—"any child of man, before His blood has cleansed us—we have no sin—to be cleansed from, instead of 'confessing our sins' (ver. 9), the truth is not in us—neither in our mouth nor in our heart"—WESLEY.

"We must be destitute even of that self-knowledge which, in the nature of things, must necessarily precede every other branch of experimental and practical religion"—B. (1 Kings 8. 46; 2 Chron. 6. 36; Job 9. 2; 15.

14; 25. 4; Prov. 20. 9; Eccles. 7. 20; Jas. 2. 2; ch. 2. 2.)

9. "But if with a penitent and believing heart we confess our sins, He is faithful—because He had promised this blessing, by the unanimous voice of all His prophets. Just—surely then He will punish: no; for this very reason He will pardon. This may seem strange; but upon the evangelical principle of atonement and redemption, it is undoubtedly true; because, when the debt is paid, or the purchase made, it is the part of equity to cancel the bond, and consign over the purchased possession. Both to forgive us our sins—to take away all the guilt of them—and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness—to purify our souls from every kind and every degree of it"—WESLEY.

"Obviously confession to Him who is faithful and just, and to those selves whom we should otherwise deceive and lead astray, is all that is meant. The passage has nothing to do with the question of confession to our fellow-men. To forgive us our sins and to cleanse us. (1) We are absolved from sin's punishment; (2) We are freed from sin's pollution. The forgiveness is the averting of God's wrath, the cleansing is the beginning of holiness"—C. B. (Ps. 32. 5; Prov. 28. 13; ver. 7; Ps. 51. 2.)

10. "Yet still we are to retain, even to our lives' end, a deep sense of our past sins. Still, if we say we have not sinned, we make Him a liar—who saith, all have sinned. And His word is not in us—we do not receive it; we give it no place in our hearts"—WESLEY.

We make him a liar. "Mark the gradation—ver. 6, 'We lie,' ver. 8, 'We deceive ourselves,' and now, ver. 10, 'We make him a liar,' by denying His word that all have sinned. His word is not in us—His word, which is 'the truth,' accuses us truly; by denying it, we drive it from our hearts"—P.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1–12. OF COMMUNION WITH THE SON.—1. My beloved children—"so the apostle frequently addresses the whole body of Christians. It is a term of tenderness and endearment, used by our Lord Himself to His disciples. (John 13. 33.) And perhaps many to whom S. John now wrote were converted by His ministry. It is a different word from that which is translated 'little children,' in several parts of the Epistle, to distinguish it from which it is here rendered 'beloved children.' I write these things to you, that ye may not sin. Thus he guards them beforehand against abusing the doctrine of reconciliation. All the words, institutions, and judgments of God are levelled against sin, either that it may not be committed, or that it may be abolished. But if anyone sin—let him not lie in sin, despairing of help—we have an advocate—we have for our advocate, not a mean person, but Him of whom it was said, 'This is My beloved Son'—not a guilty person, who stands in need of pardon for himself, but Jesus Christ the righteous—not a mere petitioner, who relies purely upon liberality, but one that has merited, fully merited, whatever He asks"—WESLEY.

"In order to walk in the light, the first step is confession of sin (ch. 1. 9), the next (ch. 2. 1) is that we should forsake all sin. An advocate (Greek, 'Paraclete'). The same term applied to the Holy Ghost, showing the unity of the Second and Third Persons of the Trinity. Christ is the Intercessor for us above, and in His absence the Holy Ghost is the other Intercessor in us. Christ's advocacy is inseparable from the Holy Spirit's comforting us and assisting our prayers"—P. (Rom. 8. 34; 1 Tim. 2. 5; Heb. 7. 25; 9. 24.)

2. And He is the propitiation—"the atoning sacrifice, by which the wrath of God is appeased. For our sins—who believe—and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world—just as wide as sin extends, the propitiation extends also"—WESLEY.

Note the present tense throughout. We have an advocate, He is the propitiation; this condition of things is perpetual, it is not something that took place a long time ago once for all. The term used for 'propitiation' occurs in the New Testament only here and ch. 4. 10; it is found in the LXX. repeatedly. (Num. 5. 8; 29. 11; Lev. 25. 9.) It is clear that the word is used in the New Testament to express expiation by an offering or sacrifice. (Rom. 3. 25; 2 Cor. 5. 18; ch. 1. 7; 4. 10.)

3. "And hereby we know that we truly and savingly know Him—as He is the advocate, the righteous, the propitiation—if we keep His commandments—particularly those of faith and love"—WESLEY.

The Gnostics boasted of enlightenment, but regarded moral character as insignificant. The apostle repeatedly warns his friends against the dangerous heresy, and under Divine inspiration employs language profitable to the Church in all ages.

4. He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar. "Heretics of that age, living in the most criminal sensual indulgence, boasted that they were the objects of Divine favour, and sure of obtaining eternal life, merely because they possessed the knowledge of the true God, and of His mercy in forgiving men's sins. In this boasting the apostle declared them liars"—B. But the same heresy nevertheless has reappeared in many forms in different ages. (Ch. 1. 6, 8; 4. 20.)

5. But whoso keepeth His word—"His commandments. Verily in Him the love of God—reconciled to us through Christ—is perfected—is perfectly known. Hereby—by our keeping His word—we know that we are in Him—so is the tree known by its fruits. To 'know Him,' to be 'in Him,' to 'abide in Him,' are nearly synonymous terms; only with a gradation—knowledge, communion, constancy" —WESLEY.

This verse expands ver. 3. "'The love of God' here means 'the love of man to God'; this is the common usage in this Epistle. (Ch. 2. 15; 3. 17; 4. 12; 5. 3.)"—C. B. Obedience, not feeling, is the test of love. And knowledge is not love, though love must spring from knowledge. (John 14. 21–23; ch. 4. 12, 13.)

6. He that saith he abideth in Him—"which implies a durable state; a constant, lasting knowledge of and communion with Him—ought himself—otherwise they are vain words—so to walk, even as He walked—in the world—as He, are words that frequently occur in this Epistle. Believers having their hearts full of Him, easily supply His name"—WESLEY.

"We have here the climax complete—(ver. 3); to know Him (ver. 5), to be in Him, and here to abide in Him. Even as He walked. The 'He' in the Greek is a different pronoun from the 'Him' immediately preceding. 'In Him' means 'in God'; 'even as He walked' refers to Christ"—C. B. (John 15. 4, 5; Matt. 11. 29; John 13. 15; 1 Pet. 2. 21.)

7. "When I speak of keeping His word, I write not a new commandment—I do not speak of any new one—but the old commandment, which ye had—even from your forefathers"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits the second from the beginning. "An old commandment concerning holiness of life, and loving one another which was given to your forefathers at the forming of your commonwealth"—B. (2 John 5; ch. 3. 11.)

8. Again, I do write a new commandment to you—"namely, with regard to loving one another. A commandment which, though it also was given long ago, yet is truly new in Him and in you. It was exemplified in Him, and is now fulfilled by you, in such a manner as it never was before. For there is no comparison between the state of the Old Testament believers, and that which ye now enjoy; the darkness of that dispensation is passed away; and Christ the true light now shineth in your hearts"—WESLEY.

The darkness is passing away (R.V.). "The repetition, in Him and in you, implies that the love-commandment finds its realisation separately, first in Him, and then in us, through His Spirit given to us. So Jesus said, 'My Father and your Father'—your Father in the highest and best sense, because He is Mine"—P. (John 13. 34; 15. 12; Rom. 13. 12; Eph. 5. 8; 1 Thess. 5. 5–8; John 1. 9; 8. 12; 12. 35.)

9. He that saith he is in the light—"in Christ united to him—and hateth his brother—the very name shows the love due to him—is in darkness until now—void of Christ and of all true light"—WESLEY.

His brother—his neighbour, and especially those of the Christian brotherhood. Even until now—notwithstanding that the true light already shineth. (1 Cor. 13. 2; 2 Pet. 1. 9; ch. 3. 14, 15.)

10. He that loveth his brother—"for Christ's sake—abideth in the light—of God—and there is no occasion of stumbling in him—whereas he that hates his brother is an occasion of stumbling to himself. He stumbles against himself, and against all things within and without; while he that loves his brother has a free, disencumbered journey"—WESLEY.

S. John has in mind Jesus' words in John 11. 9, 10, "Abiding in the light, we abide also in love, for the gospel light not only enlightens, but warms the heart into love"—P. (Ch. 3. 14; 2 Pet. 1. 10.)

11. He that hateth his brother—"and he must hate, if he does not love him: there is no medium. Is in darkness—in sin, perplexity, entanglement. He walketh in darkness, and knoweth not that he is in the high road to hell"—WESLEY.

There is no medium. Wherever spiritual life does not exist, there is the root and possibility of all evil. "The light and the darkness are within ourselves, admitted into us by the eye, whose singleness fills the whole body with light"—ALFORD. (John 12. 35.)

12. I have written to you, beloved children. "Thus S. John bespeaks all to whom he writes. But, from vers. 13–27, he divides them particularly into 'fathers,' 'young men,' and 'little children.' Because your sins are forgiven you. As if he had said, This is the sum of what I have now written. He then proceeds to other things, which are built upon this foundation"—WESLEY.

Little children—Greek, "little sons," or "dear children," not the same word as in ver. 13, "little children," infants in age or standing. He calls all to whom he writes by the first word (ch. 2. 1, 28; 3. 18; 4. 4; 5. 21); the second is only used in vers. 13–18. It is to all God's children without exception that he says, Your sins are forgiven you, for His name's sake. (Luke 24. 47; Acts 4. 12; 10. 43; 13. 38; ch. 1. 7.)

Vers. 13–27. DISTINCT APPLICATION TO FATHERS, YOUNG MEN, AND LITTLE CHILDREN.—13. "The address to spiritual fathers, young men, and little children, is first proposed in this verse, wherein he says, I write to you, fathers: I write to you, young men: I write to you, little children: and then enlarged upon; in doing which he says, 'I have written to you, fathers' (ver. 14). 'I have written to you, young men' (vers. 14–17). 'I have written to you, little children' (vers. 18–27). Having finished his address to each, he returns to all together, whom he again terms (as ver. 12), 'beloved children.' Fathers, ye have known Him that is from the beginning—ye have known the eternal God, in a manner wherein no other, even true believers, know Him. Young men, ye have overcome the wicked one—in many battles, by the power of faith. Little children, ye have known the Father—as your Father (though ye have not yet overcome), by 'the Spirit witnessing with your spirit, that ye are the children of God'" WESLEY.

"The fathers were the most ancient believers, who had made the greatest progress in the knowledge, experience, and practice of religion. Young men were those in the greatest vigour of the spiritual life, and who were considered by the apostle as soldiers fighting under Christ against the powers of darkness. Little, or young children, were the newly converted"—B. (John 1. 1.)

14. I have written to you, fathers—"as if he had said, Observe well what I but now wrote. He speaks very briefly and modestly to these, who needed not much to be said to them, as having that deep acquaintance with God which comprises all necessary knowledge. Young men, ye are strong—in faith. And the word of God abideth in you—deeply rooted in your hearts, whereby ye have often foiled your great adversary"—WESLEY.

In R.V., following the oldest MSS., the tense changes in the last clause of ver. 13. I have written unto you, young children. "It was a classic idiom to employ the past tense in letter-writing, regarding the time from the reader's point of view; when he received the letter the writing would be past"—P. By Him that was from the beginning the apostle probably means the Lord Jesus. (See ch. 1. 1.) The word of God abideth in you—the secret of their strength and the source of their victory. They are strong because they have God's will, as revealed in Scripture, as a permanent principle of action within them. The expression was an echo from the Master's words (John 15. 7), as is so frequently the case in this Epistle. (Eph. 6. 10.)

15. "To you all, whether fathers, young men, or little children, I say, Love not the world—pursue your victory by overcoming the world. If any man love the world—seek happiness in visible things, he does not love God"—WESLEY.

"The world which the 'young men' had overcome, and which we are warned not to love, means 'man and man's world, considered as in a state of estrangement from God.' God loved the world with the love of compassion, and we should so love every grade and every individual of the race, however deeply fallen. But we cannot love the world in its estrangement from God, with congeniality and complacency, and at the same time love God"—P. (Rom. 12. 2; Matt. 6. 24; Gal. 1. 10; James 4. 4.)

16. The desire of the flesh—"of the pleasure of the outward senses, whether of the taste, smell, or touch. The desire of the eye—of the pleasures of imagination, to which the eye chiefly is subservient; of that internal sense whereby we relish whatever is grand, new, or beautiful. The pride of life—all that pomp in clothes, houses, furniture, equipage, manner of living, which generally procure honour from the bulk of mankind, and so gratify pride and vanity. It therefore directly includes the desire of praise, and, remotely, covetousness. All these desires are not from God, but from the prince of this world"—WESLEY.

"A parallel has been drawn between S. John's classification and the three elements in the temptation by which Eve was overcome by the evil one, and again the three temptations by which Christ overcame the evil one: When the woman saw that the tree was good for food (the lust of the flesh), and that it was pleasant to the eye (the lust of the eye), and a tree to be desired to make one wise (the vainglory of life). (Gen. 3. 6.) Similarly the temptations—(1) to work a miracle in order to satisfy the cravings of the flesh; (2) to submit to Satan in order to win possession of all that the eye could see; (3) to tempt God, in order to win the glory of a miraculous preservation"—C. B. All this is not of the Father. The child of God turns to God. (Eccles. 5. 11.)

17. The world passeth away and the desire thereof—"that is, all that can gratify those desires passeth away with it—but he that doeth the will of God—that loves God, not the world—abideth—in the enjoyment of what he loves, for ever"—WESLEY.

"We see once more how S. John, in giving the antithesis of a previous idea, expands it. He says that the world and all its ways are on the wane; but as the opposite of this, he says, not merely that God and His will and ways abide, but that he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever. Again, he speaks of the love of the world and the love of the Father; but as the opposite of him who loves the world he says not, 'he that loveth the Father,' but 'he that doeth the will of the Father.' This implies that true love involves obedience"—C. B. (1 Cor. 7. 31; James 1. 10; 4. 14; 1 Pet. 1. 24.)

18. My little children, it is the last time. "The last dispensation of grace, that which is to continue to the end of time, is begun. Ye have heard that Antichrist cometh. Under the term Antichrist, or the spirit of Antichrist, he includes all false teachers and enemies to the truth; yea, whatever doctrines or men are contrary to Christ. It seems to have been long after this that the name of Antichrist was appropriated to that grand adversary of Christ, 'the man of sin' (2 Thess. 2. 3). Antichrist in S. John's sense, that is, antichristianism, has been spreading from his time till now; and will do so, till that great adversary arises, and is destroyed by Christ's coming"—WESLEY.

It is the last hour (R.V.). "It has been supposed to derogate from the Divine mission of the apostles to admit that they might be mistaken as to the closing hour of time. But to know that supreme instant would involve a knowledge of the whole plan of God and of the whole of the motives which would determine the appointment of that day, that is, it would constructively involve omniscience"—E. "The only point upon which we can say that the apostles were in error, is in their expectation of the immediate coming of Christ; and this is the very point, which our Saviour says (Mark 13. 32) is known only to the Father"—JELF. "The term Antichrist involves the two ideas of counterfeiting and opposing: it means an opposition Christ or rival Christ, just as we call a rival pope an anti-pope"—C. B. "In the heart of the apostolic Church was one awful anticipation: it came from those who received it from Christ (John 5. 43), and S. John gives it a name. In the Antichrist the antichristian principle is personally consecrated. Shadows and anticipations the Church has seen, but it is evident that as yet the Antichrist has not come. Wherever S. John mentions him, he connects the name with the denial of the Manhood, the Messiahship, the everlasting Sonship of Jesus, of the Father, who is His and our Father"—E. (John 21. 5; Heb. 1. 2; 2 Thess. 2. 3; 2 Pet. 2. 1; ch. 4. 3; Matt. 24. 5-24; 2 John 7; 1 Tim. 4. 1; 2 Tim. 3. 1.)

19. They were not of us. "When they went; their hearts were before departed from God, otherwise, they would have continued with us: but they went out that they might be made manifest—that is, this was made manifest by their going out"—WESLEY.

"Hence it is one of the marks of Antichrist that he had been once in the Christian Church, and a teacher by profession, but had left it or apostatised"—B. (Deut. 13. 13; Ps. 41. 9; Acts 20. 30; Matt. 24. 24; John 6. 37; 10. 28, 29; 2 Tim. 2. 19; 1 Cor. 11. 19.)

20. But ye have an anointing—"a chrism; perhaps so termed in opposition to the name of Antichrist; an inward teaching from the Holy Ghost, whereby ye know all things—necessary for your preservation from these seducers, and for your eternal salvation. S. John here but just touches upon the Holy Ghost, of whom he speaks more largely. (1 John 3. 24; 4. 13; 5. 6.)"—WESLEY.

"There appears no proof that the apostle is addressing those members of the primitive Church only who were endued with extraordinary gifts. Through the whole Epistle he is addressing Christians in general; all of whom are represented in this Epistle as dwelling in God, and God in them, and as knowing that He dwelt in them by the Spirit which He had given them. (Ch. 3. 24; 4. 16.) Now this Spirit, which all true believers possess, is a Spirit of truth as well as of grace, and leads those on whom He is conferred into all essential truth, all the grand leading doctrines of the gospel; which would sufficiently secure those to whom the apostle wrote, against the seductions of the false teachers, the Antichrists here referred to"—B. (2 Cor. 1. 21; Heb. 1. 9; ver. 27; Mark 1. 24; Acts 3. 14; John 10. 4. 5; 14. 26; 16. 13.)

21. I have written—"namely (ver. 13)—to you because ye know the truth—that is, to confirm you in the knowledge ye have already. Ye know that no lie is of the truth—that all the doctrines of these Antichrists are irreconcilable to it"—WESLEY.

Lit. Every lie is not from the truth. The true doctrine is divine in its origin, the false is not.

22. Who is that liar—"who is guilty of that lying, but he who denies that truth which is the sum of all Christianity? That Jesus is the Christ; that He is the Son of God; that He came in the flesh, is one undivided truth: and he that denies any part of this, in effect denies the whole. He is Antichrist—and the spirit of Antichrist, who in denying the Son denies the Father also"—WESLEY.

Who is the liar? (R.V.). That is, the person guilty of the lie just mentioned. (John 4. 3; 2 John 7.)

23. "Whosoever denieth the eternal Son of God, he hath not communion with the Father; but he that truly and believingly acknowledgeth the Son hath communion with the Father also"—WESLEY.

The italics in the second clause in A.V. may be disregarded. The words are evidently genuine, with the exception of the conjunction but. So R.V. Hath not the Father—"hath no interest in him as his Father, since that is only obtained through Christ"—B. Hath the Father—as his "portion." (John 15. 23; 2 John 9; John 14. 7, 9, 10; ch. 4. 15.)

24. "If that truth concerning the Father and the Son, which ye have heard from the beginning abide fixed and rooted in you, ye also shall abide in that happy communion with the Son and the Father"—WESLEY.

As for you, let that abide in you (R.V.). Also note that the words remain and continue should be abide. S. John used the same word thrice; and when he speaks of abiding in Christ, he repeats the Master's own exhortations. (2 John 6; John 14. 23; ch. 1. 3.)

25. "He—the Son—hath promised us—if we abide in Him"—WESLEY.

Some of these promises of eternal life S. John had recorded in his Gospel. (John 3. 15, 36; 6. 40, 47, 57; 17. 2, 3; ch. 1. 2; 5. 11.)

26. These things—"from ver. 21—I have written to you. S. John, according to his custom, begins and ends with the same form, and, having finished a kind of parenthesis (ver. 20-27), continues (ver. 27) what he said in ver. 20, concerning them that would seduce you"—WESLEY.

That would lead you astray (R.V.). (Ch. 3. 7; 2 John 7.)

27. Ye need not that any should teach you, save as that anointing teacheth you—"which is always the same, always consistent with itself. But this does not exclude our need of being taught by them who partake of the same anointing. Of all things—which it is necessary for you to know. And is no lie—like that which Antichrist teaches. Ye shall abide in Him—this is added both by way of comfort and of exhortation. The whole discourse, from ver. 18 to this, is peculiarly adapted to little children"—WESLEY.

And as for you, the anointing—"not that the believer is made infallible, for no believer here receives the Spirit in all its fulness, but only the measure needful for keeping him from soul-destroying error. So the Church, though having the Spirit in her, is not infallible, but is kept from ever wholly losing the saving truth"—P. (Ver. 20; Jer. 31. 33, 34; Heb. 8. 10, 11; John 14. 26; 16. 13.)

Ver. 28-3. 24.—EXHORTATION TO ABIDE IN CHRIST, IN HOPE OF ETERNAL LIFE.—28. And now, beloved children. "Having finished his address to each, he now returns to all in general. Abide in Him, that we—a modest expression—may not be ashamed before Him at His coming. Oh how will ye Jews, Socinians, nominal Christians, be ashamed in that day!"—WESLEY.

That if He shall be manifested, we may have boldness (R.V.). The word "if" implies no doubt as to the fact, but it suggests uncertainty as to the time. (Ch. 3. 2; 4. 17.)

29. Everyone—"and none else—who practiseth righteousness—from a believing, loving heart—is born of Him—for all His children are like Himself"—WESLEY.

"God is righteous, and therefore the source of righteousness; when a man doeth righteousness, we know that the source of his righteousness is God; that, consequently, he has acquired by new birth from God that righteousness which he had not by nature. We argue from his doing righteousness to his being born of God. The error of Pelagians is to conclude that doing righteousness is a condition of becoming a child of God"—ALFORD. So in Luke 7. 47, 50. "Her much love evinced that her sins were already forgiven, not, was the condition of her sins being forgiven"—P. (Acts 22. 14; ch. 3. 7, 10.)

CHAPTER III.

1. That we should be called—"that is, should be the children of God. Therefore the world knoweth us not—they know not what to make of us. We are a mystery to them"—WESLEY.

That we should be called children of God; and such we are. For this cause the world (R.V.). That is, "we are children of God, and for this cause the world knows us not, because it knew Him not." The third sentence explains how the second follows from the first. Note how R.V. has strengthened this beautiful text, by the insertion of the lost clause, and such we are. (John 1. 12; 15. 18, 19; 16. 3; 17. 25.)

2. It doth not yet appear—"even to ourselves—what we shall be. It is something ineffable, which will raise the children of God to be, in a manner, as God Himself. But we know, in general, that when He, the Son of God, shall appear, we shall be like Him, the glory of God penetrating our inmost substance. For we shall see Him as He is—manifestly, without a veil. And that sight will transform us into the same likeness"—WESLEY.

If He shall be manifested (R.V.). The word "if" used exactly as in ch. 2. 28. "The transition from God the Father to He, Him, referring to Christ (who alone is said in Scripture to be manifested), not the Father (John 1. 18), implies the entire unity of the Father and the Son"—P. Like Him—continual beholding will produce likeness. (2 Cor. 3. 18.) As He is—namely, in the glorified humanity of the Son. (Isa. 56. 5; Rom. 8. 15; Gal. 3. 26; 4. 6; ch. 5. 1; Rom. 8. 18; 2 Cor. 4. 17; Rom. 8. 29; 1 Cor. 15. 49; Phil. 3. 21; Col. 3. 4; 2 Pet. 1. 4; Job 19. 26; Ps. 16. 11; Matt. 5. 8; 1 Cor. 13. 12; 2 Cor. 5. 7.)

3. And everyone that hath this hope in Him—"in God"—WESLEY.

In Him . . . as He. In the Greek the pronouns are different. Probably we should understand that he who, relying on God, hopes to be like God hereafter, must purify himself now after the example of Christ. (Ch. 4. 17.)

4. Whosoever committeth sin—"thereby transgresseth the holy, just, and good law of God, and so sets His authority at nought; for this is implied in the very nature of sin"—WESLEY.

Everyone that doeth sin doeth also lawlessness, and sin is lawlessness (R.V.). The apostle's meaning is that no one should presume to think lightly of sin. Some of the Gnostics, as we have noted previously, declared that their spiritual enlightenment placed them above the moral law. The apostle shows that sin, being disregard of God's revealed will, cannot be reconcilable with being a child of God. (Rom. 4. 15; ch. 5. 17.)

5. "And ye know that He—Christ—was manifested—that He came into the world for this very purpose—to take away our sins—to destroy them all, root and branch, and leave none remaining. And in Him is no sin—so that He could not suffer on His own account, but to make us as Himself"—WESLEY.

Two more arguments to prove that sin is incompatible with the character of the child of God—first from the mission, then from the character of the Eternal Son, who is the perfect pattern of what a son should be. (Ch. 1. 2; Isa. 53. 5, 6, 11; 1 Tim. 1. 15; Heb. 1. 3; 9. 26; 1 Pet. 2. 24; 2 Cor. 5. 21; Heb. 4. 15; 9. 28; 1 Pet. 2. 22.)

6. "Whosoever abideth in communion with Him, by loving faith, sinneth not—while he so abideth. Whosoever sinneth certainly seeth Him not—the loving eye of his soul is not fixed upon God; neither doth he then experimentally know Him—whatever he did in time past"—WESLEY.

Hath not seen Him. "S. John does not say this of every one who commits any sin, but of the habitual sinner (present participle in the Greek). Although the believer may sometimes fall into sin, yet not sin, but opposition to sin, is the ruling principle of his life"—C. B. (Ch. 2. 4; 4. 8; 3 John 11.)

7. Let no one deceive you—"let none persuade you that any man is righteous but he that uniformly practises righteousness; he alone is righteous, after the example of his Lord"—WESLEY.

The apostle's words imply that some persons had endeavoured to deceive the brethren by teaching what he here condemns. If faith without works is dead, much more is knowledge without works dead. Works do not justify, but the justified man works, and from his doing righteousness we safely infer that he is righteousness. (Ch. 2. 26; Ezek. 18. 5, 9; Rom. 2. 13; ch. 2. 29.)

8. "He that committeth sin is a child of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning—that is, was the first sinner in the universe, and has continued to sin ever since. The Son of God was manifested to destroy the works of the devil—all sin. And will He not perform this in all that trust in Him"—WESLEY.

As before, the present participle in the Greek intimates the habitual sinner. Of the devil. "The devil made no man, begat no man: but whoso imitates the devil becomes a child of the devil. In what sense art thou a child of Abraham? Not that Abraham begat thee. In the same sense as that in which the Jews, the children of Abraham, by not imitating the faith of Abraham, are become children of the devil"—S. AUGUSTINE. From the beginning. "The phrase intimates that there has been no period of the existence of human beings in which they have not been liable to the assaults of this tempter; that accusations against God, reasons for doubting and distrusting Him, have been offered to one man after another, to one generation after another. This is just what the Scripture affirms; just the assumption which goes through the book from Genesis to the Apocalypse"—MAURICE. To destroy. The argument is that Christ's people cannot do that which Christ came to destroy. (Matt. 13. 38; John 8. 44; Gen. 3. 15; Luke 10. 18; John 16. 11; Heb. 2. 14.)

9. Whosoever is born of God—"by living faith, whereby God is continually breathing spiritual life into his soul, and his soul is continually breathing out love and prayer to God, doth not commit sin. For the Divine seed of loving faith abideth in Him; and, so long as it doth, he cannot sin, because he is born of God—is inwardly and universally changed"—WESLEY.

"His seed, the living word of God, made by the Holy Spirit the seed in us of a new life, and the continual means of sanctification. He cannot sin. (Comp. Gen. 39. 9.) 'How can I do this great wickedness? The principle within me is at utter variance with it.' The exceptional sins into which the regenerate may be surprised are owing to the new life-principle being for a time dormant, and to the sword of the Spirit not being drawn instantly. Sin is ever active, but no longer reigns"—P. "The Divine principle implanted within has not only manifested the infinite evil and the destructive consequences of sin, but has produced a fixed hatred to it, and a power over it"—B. (Ch. 5. 18; 1 Pet. 1. 23.)

10. Neither he that loveth not his brother. "Here is the transition from the general proposition to one particular"—WESLEY.

Children of the devil—an echo of the Master. "Ye are of your father the devil" (John 8. 44). There is no middle class between the children of God and the children of the devil. Loveth not—with such a love as the apostle describes and proceeds to insist upon. (Ch. 2. 49; 4. 8.)

11. The message—not a mere ethical principle, or even a mere command, but a message from "Him who hath loved us." Love one another—primarily refers to those who are our brethren in Christ. (Ch. 1. 5; 2. 7; John 13. 34; 15. 12; ver. 23; ch. 4. 7, 21; 2 John 5.)

12. Who was of the wicked one—"who showed he was a child of the devil by killing his brother. And wherefore slew he him—for any fault? No, just the reverse; for his goodness"—WESLEY.

"He could not bear that his brother's sacrifice was accepted of God while his own was rejected; a circumstance that, instead of humbling him and bringing him to repentance, as it should have done, only excited his envy and hatred, which at length settled into the most rancorous malice"—B. (Gen. 4. 4, 8; Heb. 11. 4; Jude 11.)

13. Marvel not if the world hate you—"for the same cause"—WESLEY.

The world hateth you (R.V.). There is no question of the fact. The marginal reference points to the origin of the statement. (John 15. 18, 19; 17. 14; 2 Tim. 3. 12.)

14. We know—"as if he had said, We ourselves could not love our brethren, unless we were passed from spiritual death to life, that is, born of God. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death—that is, is not born of God. And he that is not born of God cannot love his brother"—WESLEY.

"All mankind, being born in sin, are in a state of spiritual death, until they are born again; and none are born again who do not truly love God and His people"—B. We know because we love. Love is not the cause of our acceptance and regeneration, but it is the satisfactory evidence to our own minds. (Ch. 2. 10; 9. 11.)

15. "He, I say, abideth in spiritual death, is void of the life of God. For whosoever hateth his brother, and there is no medium between loving and hating him, is, in God's account, a murderer; every degree of hatred being a degree of the same temper which moved Cain to murder his brother. And no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him—but every loving believer hath. For love is the beginning of eternal life. It is the same, in substance, with glory"—WESLEY.

"Quite as a matter of course S. John passes from not loving to hating. The crisis caused by the coming of the light into the world leaves no neutral ground; all is either light or darkness, of God or of the evil one, in love or in hate. Is a murderer. Human law considers overt acts, but the Lord looketh at the heart"—C. B. (Matt. 5. 21, 22; ch. 4. 20; Gal. 5. 21; Rev. 21. 8.)

16. "The word God is not in the original. It was omitted by the apostle just as the particular name is omitted by Mary, when she says to the gardener, 'Sir, if thou hast borne Him hence,' and by the Church, when she says, 'Let Him kiss me with the kisses of His mouth' (Sol. Song, 1. 1); in both which places there is a language, a very emphatical language, even in silence. It declares how totally the thoughts were possessed by the blessed and glorious subject. It expresses also the superlative dignity and amiableness of the person meant, as though He, and He alone, was, or deserved to be, both known and admired by all. Because He laid down His life—not merely for sinners, but for us in particular. From this truth believed, from this blessing enjoyed, the love of our brethren takes its rise, which may very justly be admitted as an evidence that our faith is no delusion"—WESLEY.

Hereby know we love (R.V.). We have obtained the knowledge of what love is, by the one perfect illustration and pattern of it. Lay down our lives—"if absolutely needed for the glory of God, the good of the Church, or the salvation of a brother"—P. (John 3. 16; 15. 13; Rom. 5. 8; Eph. 5. 2, 25; ch. 4. 9, 11.)

17. But whoso hath this world's good—"worldly substance, far less valuable than life. And seeth his brother have need—the very sight of want knocks at the door of the spectator's heart—and shutteth up—whether asked or not—his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? Certainly not at all, however he may talk (ver. 18) of loving God"—WESLEY.

"If, so far from laying down our lives for them, we refuse them, when in need, some portion of our worldly goods to support their lives, the love of God can in no sense be said to be in us"—B. (Deut. 15. 7; Luke 3. 11; ch. 4. 20.)

18. Not in word only, but in deed—"in action; not in tongue, by empty professions, but in truth"—WESLEY.

In word or with the tongue (R.V.). "Contenting ourselves with complimentary expressions of regard, or with giving our Christian brethren nothing but fair speeches"—B. (Ezek. 33. 31; Rom. 12. 9; Eph. 4. 15; Jas. 2. 15; 1 Pet. 1. 22.)

19. And hereby we know—"we have a farther proof by this real, operative love—that we are of the truth—that we have true faith, that we are true children of God. And shall assure our hearts before Him—shall enjoy the assurance of His favour, and the testimony of a good conscience towards God. The 'heart,' in S. John's language, is the conscience. The word 'conscience' is not found in his writings"—WESLEY.

20. "For if we have not this testimony, if in anything our heart, our own conscience, condemn us, much more does God, who is greater than our heart—an infinitely holier and a more impartial Judge—and knoweth all things—so that there is no hope of hiding it from Him"—WESLEY.

Shall assure our heart before Him, whereinsoever our heart condemn us; because God is greater than our heart (R.V.). "We must not give 'God is greater' a one-sided interpretation, either 'God is more merciful' or 'God is more strict.' It means that God is a more perfect Judge than our heart can be. It is the difference between conscience and omniscience. The force of the verses may be summed thus: by loving our brethren in deed and truth, we come to know that we are God's children, and have His presence within us, and are able to meet the disquieting charges of conscience. For if conscience condemns us, its verdict is neither infallible nor final. We may still appeal to the omniscient God, whose love implanted within us is a sign that we are not rejected by Him"—C. B. (John 18. 37; ch. 1. 8; 1 Cor. 4. 4.)

21. If our heart condemn us not—"if our conscience, duly enlightened by the word and Spirit of God, and comparing all our thoughts, words, and works with that word, pronounce that they agree therewith—then have we confidence towards God. Not only our consciousness of His favour continues and increases, but we have a full persuasion, that whatsoever we ask we shall receive of Him"—WESLEY.

"S. John does not mean that all whose heart does not condemn them are safe before God; for some have their consciences seared, others are ignorant of the truth, and it is not sincerity simply, but sincerity in the truth which can save men. Christians are those meant here"—P. "These three verses probably present more difficulties than any other portion of this Epistle. All interpretations seem to fall into two classes, as S. John is supposed to aim at

(a) soothing conscience, or (b) awakening it. But may he not really intend people to supply something which he has omitted, and to apply it as required? The saying 'God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things' probably cuts two ways"—E. Job 22. 26; Heb. 10. 22; ch. 2. 28; 4. 17.)

22. Whatsoever we ask, we receive. Believers, as such, ask only what is in accordance with God's will; and in all they ask they bow their wishes to God's will, and so God grants them either their request, or something better than it. Because we keep His commandments. So Jesus promised, only expressing more fully the same thought, "If ye abide in Me and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will." (Ps. 34. 15; 145. 18, 19; Prov. 15. 29; Jer. 29. 12; Matt. 7. 8; 21. 22; Mark 11. 24; John 14. 13; 15. 7; 16. 23; Jas. 5. 16; ch. 5. 14; 8. 29; 9. 31.)

23. And this is His commandment—"all His commandments in one word. That we should believe and love—in the manner and degree which He hath taught. This is the greatest and most important command that ever issued from the throne of glory. If this be neglected, no other can be kept; if this be observed, all others are easy"—WESLEY.

"This verse is the answer to those who would argue from the preceding verses that all that is required of us is to do what is right; it does not much matter what we believe. Not so, says the apostle; in order to do right it is necessary to believe; this is the first step in our obedience to God's commands"—C. B. (John 6. 29; 17. 3; Matt. 22. 39; John 13. 34; 15. 12; Eph. 5. 2; 1 Thess. 4. 9; 1 Pet. 4. 8; ver. 11; ch. 4. 21; 2. 8, 11.

24. And he that keepeth His commandments — "that thus believes and loves— abideth in Him, and God in him; and hereby we know that He abideth in us, by the Spirit which He hath given us—which witnesses with our spirits that we are His children, and brings forth His fruits of peace, love, holiness. This is the transition to the treating of the Holy Spirit which immediately follows"—WESLEY.

"This appears to allude to our Lord's words (John 14. 23), 'If a man love Me, he will keep My words, and My Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.' S. John once more insists that conduct is all-important; that we may possess many kinds of enlightenment, intellectual and spiritual, but there is no union with God, and indeed no true knowledge of Him, without obedience"—C. B. (John 14. 23; 15. 10; ch. 4. 12; John 17. 21, etc.; Rom. 8. 9; ch. 4. 13.)

CHAPTER IV.

Vers. 1-21. OF THE CONFIRMATION AND FRUIT OF THIS ABIDING THROUGH THE SPIRIT. —1. Believe not every spirit — "whereby any teacher is actuated—but try the spirits—by the rule which follows. We are to try all spirits by the written word: 'To the law and to the testimony!' If any man speak not according to these, the spirit which actuates him is not of God"—WESLEY.

"Because the Gnostics and others, to gain the greater credit to their doctrines, assumed to themselves the character and authority of inspired teachers, S. John put his disciples in mind that they had an unction from the Holy One (ch. 2. 27) by which they might judge with certainty, both of teachers and of their doctrine. In this chapter he commands them not rashly to believe every teacher who professed to be inspired, but to try the inspiration, whether it was from God or from evil spirits"—B. Note that this command is addressed to all Christians. (Jer. 29. 8; Matt. 24. 4; 1 Cor. 14. 29; 1 Thess. 5. 21; Rev. 2. 2; Matt. 24. 5, 24; Acts 20. 30; 1 Tim. 4. 1; 2 Pet. 2. 1; ch. 2. 18; 2 John 7.)

2. "Every spirit—or teacher—which confesseth—both with heart and voice—Jesus Christ, who is come in the flesh, is of God. Thus His coming presupposes, contains, and draws after it the whole doctrine of Christ"—WESLEY.

"This is the crucial test, and would at once expose 'the spirits' of the Cerinthian and Docetic teachers. S. John does not say, come into the flesh; Christ did not descend, as Cerinthus said, into an already existing man; He 'became flesh.' And he does not speak simply of a Christ who came. The Greek tense implies that He is come and abides in the flesh"—C. B. In fact, the confession is that of the great twin doctrines, the incarnation and the atonement. (1 Cor. 12. 3; ch. 5. 1.)

3. Every spirit which confesseth not Jesus is not of God; and this is the spirit of the Antichrist (R.V.). Ye have heard—"from our Lord and us" that it cometh—WESLEY. (Ch. 2. 22; 2 John 7; 2 Thess. 2. 7; ch. 2. 18.)

4. Ye have overcome "those seducers, because greater is the Spirit of Christ that is in you than the spirit of Antichrist that is in the world"—WESLEY.

Ye—emphatic, in marked contrast to them. "In the masculine them the apostle passes from the antichristian spirits to the false teachers who are their mouthpieces. (Comp. John 10. 5, 'And a stranger they will not follow'; thus the stranger is defeated"—C. B. (Ch. 5. 4; John 12. 31; 14. 30; 16. 11; 1 Cor. 2. 12; Eph. 2. 2; 6. 12.)

5. They—"those false prophets—are of the world—of the number of those that know not God. Therefore speak they of the world—from the same principle, wisdom, spirit; and, of consequence, the world heareth them—with approbation"—WESLEY.

"Lest the faithful should be discouraged by the success which false teachers often have in spreading their errors, the apostle observes that their success arises generally from their accommodating their doctrines to the prejudices and evil inclinations of the world. Wherefore, from the prevalence of any doctrine, no argument can be drawn in favour of its truth"—B. (John 3. 31; 15. 19; 17. 14.)

6. We—"apostles—are of God—immediately taught, and sent by Him. Hereby we know—from what is said (vers. 2, 6)"—WESLEY.

Hereby. "This mark by which S. John directed his disciples to judge of teachers, is not to be understood of their hearkening to the apostles personally, but of their receiving their doctrine with that submission which was due to persons inspired by the Spirit of God. Wherefore, as the apostles still speak in their divinely-inspired writings, S. John declares that their writings are the text by which we are to judge both of teachers and of their doctrine"—B. (John 8. 47; 10. 27; 1 Cor. 14. 37; 2 Cor. 10. 7; Isa. 8. 20; John 14. 17.)

7. Let us love one another. "From the doctrine he has just been defending he draws this exhortation. It is by the Spirit that the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts. Everyone that truly loveth God and his neighbour is born of God"—WESLEY.

Love is of God—"from Him as its source, and enjoined by Him as a duty of absolute necessity. Everyone that loveth—in whose head this Divine principle reigns, and conquers the selfish and contrary passions, shows by it that he is regenerated, and that by the teaching of the Holy Spirit he knoweth God"—B. (Ch. 3. 10, 11, 23.)

8. God is love. "This little sentence brought S. John more sweetness, even in the time he was writing it, than the whole world can bring. God is often styled holy, righteous, wise; but not holiness, righteousness, or wisdom in the abstract as He is said to be love; intimating that this is His darling, His reigning attribute, the attribute that sheds an amiable glory on all His other perfections"—WESLEY.

Knoweth not God. "This is a remarkable instance of S. John's habit of not making the second part of an antithesis an exact counterpart of the first, but an advance beyond it. Instead of saying, 'is not born of God,' he says, 'never knew God,' which is much stronger"—C. B. "God is essentially love; not merely is loving, for then S. John's argument would not stand"—P. (Ch. 2. 4; 3. 6; ver. 16.)

9. Sent His Only-begotten Son. Evidently the text alludes to our Lord's words, John 3. 16. But the expression "sent" insists upon the fact that He was the Only-begotten Son before He was sent into the world. Live through Him—who has redeemed us from sin and death, and by His Spirit dwells in us. (John 3. 16; Rom. 5. 8; 8. 32; ch. 3. 16; 5. 11.)

10. Not that we loved God—first; for we were, on the contrary, in a state of enmity to Him. But that He loved us—first, without any merit or motive in us. This is love in its ideal manifestation. (John 15. 16; Rom. 5. 8, 10; Tit. 3. 4; ch. 2. 2.)

11. We ought, as being born of God and bearing His likeness, to exhibit it in this, to love one another. (Matt. 18. 28; John 15. 12, 13; ch. 3. 16.)

12. If we love one another, God abideth in us—"this is treated of, vers. 13-16. And His love is perfected—has its full effect—in us. This is treated of, vers. 17-19"—WESLEY.

"God, whom no man hath seen at any time, has appointed His children as the visible recipients of our kindness, which flows from our love to Himself"—P. (John 1. 18; 1 Tim. 6. 16; ver. 20; ch. 2. 5; ver. 18.)

13. He hath given us of His Spirit—"in the enlightening, quickening, renewing, and comforting influences thereof"—B. Of His Spirit. To Christ alone is the Spirit given without measure. (John 14. 20; ch. 3. 24.)

14. "And in consequence of this, we have seen and testify that the Father sent the Son. These are the foundation and the criteria of our abiding in God and God in us, the communion of the Spirit, and the confession of the Son"—WESLEY.

The communion of the Spirit, spoken of in ver. 13, and the confession of the Son, ver. 15. (John 1. 14; ch. 1. 1, 2; John 3. 17.)

15. "Whosoever shall, from a principle of loving faith, openly confess, in the face of all opposition and danger, that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in Him"—WESLEY.

There is a blessed union between that soul and God, so that it is, in the language of Scripture, the habitation of God; while, at the same time, it makes the Most High its habitation. (Rom. 10. 9; ch. 5. 1, 5.)

16. And we know and believe—"by the same Spirit, the love that God hath to us"—WESLEY.

In us (R.V.)—that is, "in our case." "He that abideth in love, to God, His people, and all mankind, abideth in God. His union and communion with God are continued and increased"—B. (Vers. 8, 12; ch. 3. 4.)

17. Hereby—"that is, by this communion with God—is our love made perfect; that we may—that is, so that we shall have boldness in the day of judgment—when all the stout-hearted shall tremble. Because as He—Christ—is—all love—so are we—who are fathers in Christ, even in this world"—WESLEY.

Herein is love made perfect with us (R.V.). Boldness. "It is the splendid word which denotes the citizen's right of free speech, the masculine privilege of courageous liberty. It is the tender word which expresses the child's unhesitating confidence, the 'saying all out' to the parent. And the ground of the boldness is conformity to Christ"—E. (Jas. 2. 13; ch. 2. 28; 3. 19, 21.)

18. There is no fear in love—"no slavish fear can be where love reigns. But perfect, adult love casteth out slavish fear; because such fear hath torment—and so is inconsistent with the happiness of love. A natural man has neither fear nor love; one that is awakened, fear without love; a babe in Christ, love and fear; a father in Christ, love without fear"—WESLEY.

Fear hath punishment (R.V.). "This is true in two ways—(1) fear involves the idea of punishment; (2) fear is a foretaste of punishment"—C. B. Fear cannot exist where there is the boldness spoken of, ver. 17. Of course the filial fear of offending God is a perfectly different thing. (Ver. 12.)

19. We love Him because He first loved us—"this is the sum of all religion, the genuine model of Christianity. None can say more: why should anyone say less, or less intelligibly?"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits Him. We love Him and His children, and the whole world, because He first loved us. Observe that the pronouns are emphatic.

20. Whom he hath seen—"who is daily presented to his senses, to raise his esteem, and move his kindness or compassion towards him"—WESLEY.

Whom he hath not seen—"whose excellences are not the objects of his senses, but are discovered imperfectly from His works, and from the declarations and promises of His word"—B. Of course the argument is not that we must love the brethren first, in order that we may love God. It is simply that nothing can prove our love to God, but our love to our brethren. (Ch. 2. 4; 3. 17; ver. 12.)

21. And this commandment have we from Him—"both God and Christ—that he who loveth God love his brother—everyone, whatever his opinions or mode of worship be, purely because he is the child, and bears the image, of God. Bigotry is properly the want of this pure and universal love. A bigot only loves those who embrace his opinions, and receive his way of worship; and he loves them for that, and not for Christ's sake"—WESLEY.

"The apostle drives home the argument for the practice of brotherly love, by the fact that God has commanded those who love Him to love their brethren. Where has God given commandment? In the whole Law, which is summed up in loving God with all one's heart, and one's neighbour as one's self. (Deut. 6. 5; Lev. 19. 8; Luke 10. 27.) The apostle anticipates a possible objection. A man may say, 'I can love God without loving my brother; and I can prove my love by keeping His commandments.' (John 14. 15.) Nay, says S. John, your own argument shows your error; you cannot keep His commandments without loving your brother"—C. B. (Matt. 22. 37, 39; John 13. 34; 15. 12; ch. 3. 23.)

CHAPTER V.

Vers. 1-12. OF THE TESTIMONY OF THE FATHER, SON, AND SPIRIT, ON WHICH ALL CHRISTIANITY, DOCTRINAL, EXPERIMENTAL, AND PRACTICAL, IS FOUNDED.—1. "The scope and sum of this whole paragraph appears from the conclusion of it, ver. 13. 'These things have I written to you who believe, that ye may know that ye who believe have eternal life.' So faith is the first and the last point with S. John also. Everyone who loveth God that begat, loveth Him also that is begotten of Him—hath a natural affection to all his brethren"—WESLEY.

"To believe that Jesus is the Christ is to believe that One who was known as a man fulfilled a known and Divine commission; that He who was born and was crucified is the Anointed, the Messiah of Israel, the Saviour of the world. To believe this is to accept both the Old and the New Testaments; it is to believe that Jesus is what He claimed to be, One who is equal with the Father"—C. B. (John 1. 12; ch. 2. 22, 23; 4. 2, 15; John 1. 13; 15. 23.)

2. Hereby we know—"this is a plain proof—that we love the children of God—as His children"—WESLEY.

This is the converse of the fact stated in ch. 4. 20, 21. "And it is necessary to be showed, since men may love the children of God because of some common bond of friendship, etc. By what mark, then, can we know that our love to the children of God is of the right sort? By this, says the apostle, we may know that we love the children of God in a right manner, when we love God, and from that excellent principle, keep His commandments"—B.

3. For this is the love of God—"the only sure proof of it—that we keep His commandments: and His commandments are not grievous—to any that are born of God"—WESLEY.

"As they are all most equitable, reasonable, and gracious in themselves, and calculated to promote our happiness in time and eternity, so fervent love to Him whose commandments they are, and to His children, whom we desire to edify by a godly example, will make them pleasant and delightful to us"—B. (John 14. 15, 21, 23; 15. 10; 2 John 6; Micah 6. 8; Matt. 11. 30.)

4. For whatsoever. "This expression implies the most unlimited universality—is born of God overcometh the world—conquers whatever it can lay in the way, either to allure or fright the children of God from keeping His commandments. And this is the victory—the grand means of overcoming—even our faith—seeing all things are possible to him that believeth"—WESLEY.

That hath overcome the world (R.V.). "The victory, where faith is, hereby is implied as having been already attained"—P. (John 16. 33; ch. 3. 9; 4. 4.)

5. Who is he that overcometh the world—"that is superior to all worldly care, desire, fear? Every believer, and none else. The seventh verse (usually so reckoned) is a brief recapitulation of all which has been before advanced concerning the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. It is cited, in conjunction with the sixth and eighth, by Tertullian, Cyprian, and an uninterrupted train of fathers. And indeed, what the sun is in the world, what the heart is in a man, what the needle is in the mariner's compass, this verse is in the Epistle. By this the sixth, eighth, and ninth verses are indissolubly connected; as will be evident, beyond all contradiction, when they are accurately considered"—WESLEY.

"By believing, we are made one with Jesus the Son of God, and partake His victory over the world"—P. In reference to Mr. Wesley's allusion to the seventh verse, both here and in subsequent notes, it must be at once remarked that the R.V., on conclusive evidence, entirely omits the passage in dispute. "If there is one thing that is certain in textual criticism, it is that this famous passage is not genuine. The Revisers have only performed an imperative duty in excluding it from both text and margin. There are three facts which every one should know, and which alone are enough to show that the words are an interpolation—(1) They are not found in any Greek MS. earlier than the fourteenth century; (2) Not one of the Greek or Latin fathers who conducted the controversies about the doctrine of the Trinity in the third, fourth, and first half of the fifth centuries, ever quotes the words; (3) The words occur first towards the end of the fifth century in Latin, and are found in no other language until the fourteenth century"—C. B. (1 Cor. 15. 57; ch. 4. 15).

6. This is He. "S. John here shows the immovable foundation of that faith that Jesus is the Son of God; not only the testimony of man, but the firm, indubitable testimony of God. Who came. Jesus is He of whom it was promised that He should come; and who, accordingly, is come. And this the Spirit, and the water, and the blood testify. Even Jesus—who, coming by water and blood, is by this very thing demonstrated to be the Christ. Not by the water only—wherein He was baptized—but by the water and the blood—which He shed when He had finished the work His Father had given Him to do. He not only undertook at His baptism 'to fulfil all righteousness,' but on the cross accomplished what He had undertaken; in token whereof, when all was finished, blood and water came out of His side. And it is the Spirit who likewise testifieth—of Jesus Christ, namely, by Moses and all the Prophets, by John the Baptist, by all the apostles, and in all the writings of the New Testament. And against His testimony there can be no exception, because the Spirit is truth—the very God of truth"—WESLEY.

Not with the water only, but with the water and the blood (R.V.). "We worship one Lord Jesus Christ, attested not only by baptism in Jordan, the witness of water, but by the death on Calvary, the witness of blood. He came by water and blood, as the means by which His office was manifested; but with the water and the blood, as the sphere in which He exercises that office"—E. "The implies that the water and the blood were sacred and well-known symbols. John Baptist came only baptizing with water, and therefore was not the Messiah. Jesus came first to undergo Himself the double baptism of water and blood, and then to baptize us with the Spirit-cleansing, of which water is the sacramental seal, and with His atoning blood, the efficacy of which, once for all shed, is perpetual in the Church, and therefore is the Messiah. The Spirit is an additional witness. He attested these truths at Jesus' baptism by descending upon Him and throughout His ministry, by enabling Him to speak and do what no man before or since has spoken or done; and He still bears witness in the Church"—P. (John 19. 34; 14. 17; 15. 26; 16. 13; 1 Tim. 3. 16.)

7, 8. For there are three that bear witness, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and the three agree in one (R.V.)—lit. "testifying," or "bearing witness." "The participle is put for (instead of) the noun 'witness,' to intimate that the act of testifying, and the effect of it, are continually present. The Spirit—in the word, confirmed by miracles. The water—of baptism, wherein we are dedicated to the Son (with the Father and Spirit), typifying His spotless purity, and the inward purifying of our nature. And the blood—represented in the Lord's Supper, and applied to the consciences of believers. And these three harmoniously agree in one—in bearing the same testimony, that Jesus Christ is the Divine, the complete, the only Saviour of the world"—WESLEY.

N.B.—Part of Mr. Wesley's notes on these verses is omitted, being based on the retention of a passage which is absolutely excluded by a textual criticism more accurate than was possible in his day.

"By the baptism received by Christ, and by His redeeming blood-shedding, and by that which the Spirit of God, whose witness is infallible, has effected and still effects by Him, the Spirit, the Water, and the Blood unite as the threefold witness, to verify His Divine Messiahship"—NEANDER. (John 1. 1; Rev. 19. 13; John 10. 30.)

9. If we receive the testimony of men—"as we do continually, and must do in a thousand instances—the testimony of God is greater—of higher authority, and much more worthy to be received, namely, this very testimony which God the Father, together with the Word and the Spirit, hath testified of the Son, as the Saviour of the world"—WESLEY.

The witness of God is this, that He hath borne witness concerning His Son (R.V.). (John 8. 17, 18; Matt. 3. 16, 17; 17. 5.)

10. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the testimony—"the clear evidence of this, in himself; he that believeth not God, in this, hath made Him a liar; because he supposes that to be false which God has expressly testified"—WESLEY.

"For the first time in this Epistle we have the full phrase to believe on, of which S. John is so fond in his Gospel, where it occurs nearly forty times. It expresses the strongest confidence and trust; faith which moves towards and reposes on its object. 'To believe a person' need mean no more than to believe what he says (ch. 4. 1); 'to believe on or in a person' is to have full trust in his character"—C. B.

"The witness in Himself—God's Spirit testifying that 'Jesus is the Lord,' the 'Christ,' the 'Son of God.' The witness of the Spirit in the believer himself to his own sonship is not here expressed, but follows as a consequence"—P. (Rom. 8. 16; Gal. 4. 6; John 3. 33; 5. 38.)

11. "And this is the sum of that testimony, that God hath given us a title to, and the real beginning of, eternal life; and that this is purchased by, and treasured up in, His Son, who has all the springs and the fulness of it in Himself, to communicate to His body, the Church, first in grace and then in glory"—WESLEY.

That God gave unto us (R.V.). "Gave must not be weakened into 'offered,' still less 'promised'"—C. B. Eternal life—"viz. a title to it, in their justification and adoption (Tit. 3. 7; Rom. 8. 17); a meetness for it, in their new creation or sanctification (Col. 1. 12; 2 Cor. 5. 17; Eph. 4. 22, 24); and a foretaste, or earnest of it, by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in their hearts (Eph. 1. 14)"—B. In His Son—"whose doctrine revealed it, whose merits procured it, whose Spirit hath imparted the beginning of it, and whose example will conduct us to the complete possession of it"—B. (Ch. 2. 25; John 1. 4; ch. 4. 9.)

12. "It plainly follows, He that hath the Son—living and reigning in him by faith—hath this life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not this life—hath no part or lot therein. In the former clause, the apostle says simply the Son; because believers know Him: in the latter, the Son of God; that unbelievers may know how great a blessing they fall short of"—WESLEY.

"Faith is the means by which the regenerate have Christ as a present possession, and in having Him have life in its germ and reality now, and shall have life in its full manifestation hereafter"—P. (John 3. 36; 5. 24.)

13. These things have I written. "In the introduction (1 John 1. 4), he said, 'I write': now, in the close, 'I have written.' That ye may know—with a fuller and stronger assurance, that ye have eternal life"—WESLEY.

These things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, even unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God (R.V.). These things. "This Epistle; he towards the close of his Gospel wrote similarly (John 20. 30, 31), stating his purposes in having written. In ch. 1. 4, he states the object of writing this Epistle to be, 'that your joy may be full.' To know that we have eternal life is the sure way to joy in God"—P. (John 20. 31; ch. 1. 1, 2.)

14. And we—"who believe—have this further confidence in Him, that He heareth—that is, favourably regards, whatever prayer we offer in faith, according to His revealed will"—WESLEY.

According to His will. "This is the only limitation, and it is a very gracious limitation. This will is always for His children's good, and therefore it is only when they ignorantly ask for what is not for their good that their prayers are denied. (Comp. S. Paul's case, 2 Cor. 12. 9)"—C. B. (Ch. 3. 32.)

15. We have—"faith anticipates the blessings—the petitions which we asked of Him—even before the event. And when the event comes, we know it comes in answer to our prayer"—WESLEY.

"The meaning of this is, that God's hearing is not in vain; but that, as He hears in general, so He will grant in due time, and in His own way, those particular mercies which we ask of Him"—B.

16. "This extends to things of the greatest importance. If anyone see his brother—that is, any man—sin a sin which is not unto death—that is, any sin but total apostasy from both the power and form of godliness—let him ask, and God will give him life—pardon and spiritual life, for that sinner. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for that—that is, let him not pray for it. 'A sin unto death' may likewise mean, one which God has determined to punish with death"—WESLEY.

Sinning a sin not unto death (R.V.). There is a sin unto death. "The following explanations of 'sin unto death' may be safely rejected—(1) Sin punished by the Law with death; (2) Sin punished by Divine visitation with death or sickness; (3) Sin punished by the Church with excommunication. As a help to a right explanation, we may remember that no sin, if repented of, can be too great for God's mercy. Hence S. John does not speak of this sin as 'fatal' or 'mortal,' but as unto death. It is possible to close the heart against the influences of God's Spirit so obstinately and persistently, that repentance becomes a moral impossibility. Such a condition is necessarily sin, and sin unto death. Sin unto death, therefore, is not any act of sin, however heinous, but a state or habit of sin wilfully chosen and persisted in; it is constant and consummate opposition to God. Not concerning this do I say that he should make request (R.V.). The prayer of faith is all-prevailing when it is in accordance with God's will. This is the sole limit as regards prayer on our own behalf. Is there any other limit in the case of prayer on behalf of another? Yes, there is in that other's own will; this will prove a further limitation. Against a rebel will even the prayer of faith in accordance with God's will (for, of course, God desires the submission of the rebel) may be offered in vain"—C. B. (Job 42. 8; Jas. 5. 14, 15; Matt. 12. 31, 32; Mark 3. 29; Luke 12. 10; Heb. 6. 4, 6; 10. 26; Jer. 7. 16; 14. 11; John 17. 9.)

17. "All deviation from perfect holiness is sin; but all sin is not unpardonable"—WESLEY. (Ch. 3. 4.)

18. "Yet this gives us no encouragement to sin: on the contrary, it is an indisputable truth, he that is born of God—that sees and loves God—sinneth not—so long as that loving faith abides in him, he neither speaks nor does anything which God hath forbidden. He keepeth himself—watching unto prayer. And, while he does this, the wicked one toucheth him not—so as to hurt him"—WESLEY.

We know—"thrice repeated emphatically, to enforce the three truths which the words preface. This verse warns against abusing vers. 16, 17, as warranting carnal security. He that was begotten of God keepeth him (R.V.). The first 'we know' is of a sense of purity made possible to the Christian through the keeping by Him who is the One-begotten of God"—E. (1 Pet. 1. 23; ch. 3. 9; Jas. 1. 27.)

19. We know that we are children of God—"by the witness and the fruit of His Spirit (1 John 3. 24). But the whole world—all who have not His Spirit, not only is 'touched' by him, but by idolatry, fraud, violence, lasciviousness, impiety, all manner of wickedness. Lieth in the wicked one—void of life, void of sense. In this short expression the horrible state of the world is painted in the most lively colours; a comment on which we have in the actions, conversations, contracts, quarrels, and friendships of worldly men"—WESLEY.

Lieth in the evil one (R.V.). "Lieth in the power of, and abiding in, the wicked one, as the resting-place and lord of his slaves"—P. (Gal. 1. 4.)

20. And we know—"by all these infallible proofs—that the Son of God is come—into the world. And He hath given us a spiritual understanding, that we may know Him, the true One—'the faithful and true Witness.' And we are in the true One—as branches in the vine, even in Jesus Christ, the Eternal Son of God. This Jesus is the only living and true God, together with the Father and the Spirit, and the original fountain of eternal life. So the beginning and the end of the Epistle agree"—WESLEY.

Is come. "This includes the notion 'is here'"—C. B. "He is here, all is full of Him. His incarnation, work, and abiding presence is to us a living fact"—ALFORD. "He hath given us understanding that we know continuously the very God; and in His Son Jesus Christ (this is the very God and eternal life) we are in the very God. This interpretation of the passage is supported by the position of the pronoun, which cannot be referred naturally to any subject but Jesus Christ"—E. "We are in the true God by virtue of being in His Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, this Jesus Christ"—P. (Luke 24. 45; John 17. 3; Isa. 9. 6; 44. 6; 54. 5; John 20. 28; Acts 20. 28; Rom. 9. 5; 1 Tim. 3. 16; Tit. 2. 13; Heb. 1. 8.)

21. Keep yourselves from idols—"from all worship of false gods, from all worship of images, or of any creature, and from every inward idol; from loving, desiring, fearing anything more than God. Seek all help and defence from evil, all happiness in the true God alone"—WESLEY.

"There is no need to seek far-fetched figurative interpretations. The literal meaning lies close at hand, is suggested by the context, and is in harmony with the known circumstances of the time. Every street through which his readers walked, every heathen house they visited, swarmed with idols. The emphatic warning against the worship of creatures intensifies the whole teaching of the Epistle, the main purpose of which is to establish the fact that the Son of God is come in the flesh in the Man Jesus. Such a Being was worthy of worship"—C. B. (1 Cor. 10. 14.)

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

THIS appears on the surface to be a private and friendly letter, sent by the venerable apostle to a worthy Christian matron. And in all probability such is its real character, although some interpreters have suggested that the "Elect Lady" was symbolical of a Church, and her "Elect Sister" (ver. 13), of another Church. Such a suggestion seems scarcely in keeping with the dignity and simplicity of the apostolic character. It is not improbable that the word which both the Authorised and Revised Versions render "Lady" may be, as Mr. Wesley suggested, a proper name, Kyria.

Many expressions in the letter recall similar language in the First Epistle, while the whole spirit of it is characteristic of the Apostle John.

"THE PARTS OF THIS EPISTLE, WRITTEN TO SOME CHRISTIAN MATRON AND HER RELIGIOUS CHILDREN, ARE THREE—

I. The Inscription, ... Vers. 1, 3.
II. An Exhortation to persevere in true faith and love, . . ,, 4-11.
III. The Conclusion, ... ,, 12, 13."
—WESLEY.

Vers. 1-3. THE INSCRIPTION.—1. The elder—"an appellation suited to a familiar letter, but upon a weighty subject. To the elect—that is, Christian. Kuria is undoubtedly a proper name, both here and in ver. 5; for it was not then usual to apply the title of lady to any but the Roman empress; neither would such a manner of speaking have been suitable to the simplicity and dignity of the apostle. Whom—both her and her children—I love in the truth—with unfeigned and holy love"—WESLEY.

The elder. "Clearly the writer meant to express the singular and lofty position he held in the circle around him, as the teacher venerable for his old age, and the last of the apostles"—DOLLINGER. Unto the elect lady—"or, possibly, 'unto the elect Kyria'; but the other is better, as leaving open the question, which cannot be determined with any approach to certainty, whether the letter is addressed to an individual or a community"—C. B. Love in the truth (R.V. "In truth"). Not I only. Mutual love was one of the marks of the primitive Church. (1 John 3. 18; 3 John 1; ver. 3; John 8. 32; Gal. 2. 5, 14; 3. 1; 5. 7; Col. 1. 5; 2 Thess. 2. 13; 1 Tim. 2. 4; Heb. 10. 26.)

2. For the truth's sake, which abideth in us—"as a living principle of faith and holiness"—WESLEY.

"Which, I trust, God will enable us to believe and obey to the end"—B.

3. "Grace takes away guilt; mercy, misery; peace implies the abiding in grace and mercy. It includes the testimony of God's Spirit, both that we are His children, and that all our ways are acceptable to Him. This is the very foretaste of heaven itself, where it is perfected. In truth and love—or, 'faith and love,' as S. Paul speaks. Faith and truth are here synonymous terms"—WESLEY.

Grace, mercy, and peace shall be with us (R.V.). (1 Tim. 1. 2; ver. 1.)

Vers. 4-11. THE EXHORTATION.—4. I found of thy children—"probably in their aunt's house (ver. 13)—walking in the truth—in faith and love"—WESLEY.

"The apostle has met with some of the elect lady's children (or some members of the particular church addressed) probably in one of his apostolic visits to some church in Asia Minor. Their Christian life delighted him, and apparently prompted him to write this letter"—C. B. Even as. The standard of truth in doctrine and in life is the commandment of the Father. (3 John 3.)

5. That which we had from the beginning—"of our Lord's ministry. Indeed it was, in some sense, from the beginning of the world. That we may love one another—more abundantly"—WESLEY.

Not a new commandment. "It was old, in that Christians heard it from the first in the gospel preaching; new, in that the gospel rested love on the new principle of filial imitation of God who first loved us, and gave Jesus to die for us"—P. I beseech thee. The word is perhaps rather "I request thee"—indicating some degree of authority. (1 John

2. 7, 8; 3. 11; John 13. 14; 15. 12; Eph. 5. 2; 1 Pet. 4. 8; 1 John 3. 23.)

6. "And this is the proof of true love, universal obedience built on the love of God. This—love—is the great commandment which ye have heard from the beginning—of our preaching"—WESLEY.

That ye should walk in it—in brotherly love; S. John speaks of walking in truth, in light, in darkness, but of walking according to the commandment. (John 14. 15, 21; 15. 10; 1 John 2. 5; 5. 3; 2. 24.)

7. "Carefully keep what ye have heard from the beginning, for many seducers are entered into the world, who confess not Jesus Christ that came in the flesh—who disbelieve either His prophetic, or priestly, or kingly office. Whosoever does this is the seducer—from God—and the Antichrist—fighting against Christ"—WESLEY.

Even they that confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh (R.V.; Greek, "coming"). "The translation may be, 'that confess not Jesus Christ as coming in the flesh,' or 'that confess not Jesus as Christ coming in the flesh.' These deceivers denied not merely the fact of the Incarnation, but its possibility"—C. B. "The deceiver and the Antichrist (R.V.). The denial of the reality of His manifestation in the flesh at His first coming, and of His personal advent again, constitutes Antichrist. The many who in degree fulfil the character are forerunners of the final personal Antichrist"—P. (1 John 2. 22; 4. 1, 2, 3.)

8. That we lose not the things which we have wrought—"which every apostate does—but receive a full reward—having fully employed all our talents to the glory of Him that gave them. Here again the apostle modestly transfers it to himself"—WESLEY.

"That ye lose not the things which we have wrought (R.V.). That ye lose not the believing state of truth and love, which we, as God's workmen, have wrought. Full reward. Eternal life is called a 'full' reward in contrast to real but incomplete rewards which believers receive in this life"—C. B. (Mark 13. 9; Gal. 3. 4; Heb. 10. 32, 35.)

9. "Receive this as a certain rule, Whosoever transgresseth—any law of God—hath not God—for his Father and his God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ—believing and obeying it—he hath both the Father and the Son—for his God"—WESLEY.

Whosoever goeth onward (R.V.)—"may be interpreted in two ways—(1) Everyone who sets himself up as a leader; (2) Every one who goes on beyond the gospel. The latter is perhaps better. These antichristian Gnostics were advanced thinkers; the gospel was all very well for the unenlightened, but they knew something higher"—C. B. "The loss mentioned (ver. 8) is explained here. It is the not having God"—P. (1 John 2. 23.)

10. If any come to you—"either as a teacher or a brother—and bring not this doctrine—that is, advance anything contrary to it—receive him not into your house—as either a teacher or a brother—neither bid him God-speed—give him no encouragement therein"—WESLEY.

The Greek is indicative, implying that such persons actually do come; probably it refers to their coming as professed teachers. Neither bid him God-speed (R.V. "Give him no greeting"). (Rom. 16. 17; 1 Cor. 5. 11; 16. 22; Gal. 1. 8, 9; 2 Tim. 3. 5; Tit. 3. 10.)

11. For he that biddeth him God-speed—"that gives him any encouragement, is accessory to his evil deeds"—WESLEY.

"Those who entertained, or otherwise showed respect to false teachers, enabled them more effectually to spread their erroneous doctrines"—B. "S. John's naturally fiery zeal directed to a right end"—P.

12. Having many things to write, I was not minded to write now—"only of these, which were then peculiarly needful"—WESLEY.

"Probably the apostle meant that he had many things to say concerning the characters and actions of the false teachers, perhaps to mention the names of those whom he had particularly in view. But these things he did not think proper to write"—B. Unto you—includes the children mentioned in ver. 1. (3 John 13; John 17. 13; 1 John 1. 4.)

13. The children of thy elect or Christian sister—"absent, if not dead, when the apostle wrote this"—WESLEY.

"That the elect sister herself sends no greeting is taken as an argument in favour of this 'elect lady' being a church, and the 'elect sister' a sister church, which could send no greeting but that of its members or 'children.' But the verse fits the other hypothesis equally well; Kyria's nephews might be in business at Ephesus or elsewhere, the mother might be absent or dead"—C. B. (1 Pet. 5. 13.)

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

LIKE the Second Epistle, this is addressed to an individual Christian. It was evidently written at about the same time. Both these Epistles were for a time regarded as of doubtful origin, but the most recent and impartial criticism confirms the ancient estimate of them as genuine and apostolic.

This brief letter first expresses the apostle's gratification at what he had heard from certain travelling Evangelists, of the hospitality which Gaius had shown to them, and of the general consistency of his life. He speaks with just displeasure of the insolence of Diotrephes, and commends the character of Demetrius. He sends to personal friends an individual greeting, and hopes soon to see Gaius again.

"I. The Inscription, ... Vers. 1, 2.
II. The commendation of Caius, with a caution against Diotrephes and a recommendation of Demetrius, ... ,, 3–12.
III. The Conclusion, ... ,, 13–15."
—WESLEY.

Vers. 1, 2. THE INSCRIPTION.—1. "Caius was probably that Caius of Corinth whom S. Paul mentions. (Rom. 16. 23.) If so, either he was removed from Achaia into Asia, or S. John sent this letter to Corinth"—WESLEY.

The person addressed may, or may not, have been Gaius of Macedonia (Acts 19. 29), Gaius of Derbe (Acts 20. 4), or Gaius of Corinth. The name Caius was perhaps the most common of all Latin names. Gaius was the Greek form. (2 John 1.)

2. That in all things thou mayest prosper. "I know that you are prospering in spiritual things; I wish you similar prosperity in reference to bodily health and to all temporal business"—WESLEY.

Vers. 3–8. THE COMMENDATION OF GAIUS. —3. For—"I know thou usest all thy talents to His glory. The truth that is in thee—the true faith and love"—WESLEY. (2 John 4.)

4. I have no greater joy than this—"such is the spirit of every true Christian pastor—to hear that my children walk in the truth—Caius probably was converted by S. Paul. Therefore when S. John speaks of him, with other believers, as his children, it may be considered as the tender style of paternal love, whoever were the instruments of their conversion. And his using this appellation, when writing under the character of 'the elder,' has its peculiar beauty"—WESLEY.

"My children, means, in particular, members of the churches in Asia which were under S. John's apostolic care"—C. B. (1 Cor. 4. 15; Philem. 10.)

5. Faithfully—"uprightly and sincerely"—WESLEY.

Thou doest a faithful work in whatsoever thou doest toward them that are brethren and strangers withal (R.V.). "The brethren and the strangers are not two classes, but one and the same. It enhanced the hospitality of Gaius that the Christians whom he entertained were personally unknown to him"—C. B.

6. Who have testified of thy love before the Church—"the congregation with whom I now reside. Whom if thou send forward on their journey—supplied with what is needful—thou shalt do well—how tenderly does the apostle enjoin this!"—WESLEY.

"The brethren so entertained by Gaius were missionary evangelists (ver. 7); and probably, in narrating their missionary labours for the edification of the church where S. John then was, incidentally mentioned the loving hospitality shown them by Gaius"—P. After a godly sort (R.V. "worthily of God"). He who honours God's missionary servants honours God.

7. They went forth—"to preach the gospel"—WESLEY.

For his name's sake (R.V. "For the sake of the name"). Taking nothing of the Gentiles—towards their maintenance, as S. Paul at Corinth and at Thessalonica. (1 Cor. 9. 12, 15.)

8. To receive—"with all kindness—the truth—which they preach"—WESLEY.

We—"in contradistinction to the Gentiles. As they take nothing from the Gentiles, we ought to take them up so as to support them"—P.

Vers. 9–12. A CAUTION AGAINST DIOTREPHES, AND A RECOMMENDATION OF DEMETRIUS. —9. I wrote to the church—"probably that to which they came. But Diotrephes—perhaps the pastor of it—who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them—to govern all things according to his own will—receiveth us not—neither them nor me. So did the mystery of iniquity already work!"—WESLEY.

"This is the most surprising part of the letter; that any Christian should be found to act in this manner towards the last surviving apostle is nothing less than astounding. But from the first the New Testament is full of the saddest surprises. And those who accept as historical the treachery of Judas, the denial of S. Peter, the quarrels of apostles both before and after their Lord's departure, and the flagrant abuses in the church of Corinth, will not be disposed to think it incredible that Diotrephes acted in the manner here described even towards the Apostle John"—C. B. Receiveth us not—"virtually, by not receiving with love the brethren whom we recommended to be received"—P.

10. He prateth against us—"both them and me, thereby endeavouring to excuse himself"—WESLEY.

I will remember (R.V. "bring to remembrance"). Perhaps, will direct public attention to the matter. Casteth them—that would receive the brethren, by excommunication—from the Church.

11. Follow not that which is evil—"in Diotrephes—but that which is good—in Demetrius. He hath not seen God—is a stranger to Him"—WESLEY.

The doctrine, asserting the indissoluble connection of spiritual religion with practical obedience, and the phrases employed to express it, are familiar to every reader of S. John's writings. (Ps. 37. 27; Isa. 1. 16, 17; 1 Pet. 3. 11; 1 John 2. 29; 3. 6, 9.)

12. And from the truth itself—"that is, what they testify is the very truth. Yea, we also bear testimony—I and they that are with me"—WESLEY.

Demetrius hath the witness . . . of the truth itself (R.V.). The gospel standard of truth bears witness to him that he walks conformably to it. (1 Tim 3. 7; John 21. 24.)

Vers. 13, 14. THE CONCLUSION.—13. I am unwilling to write them unto thee with ink and pen (R.V.). The ink was make of soot and water, thickened with gum. The pen was a split reed. The paper was still made of Egyptian papyrus.

14. Peace be to thee. A common salutation with a Christian meaning thrown into it. "Peace inward of conscience, peace fraternal of friendship, peace supernal of glory"—LYRA. Salute the friends by name—"that is, in the same manner as if I had named them one by one. The word 'friend' does not often occur in the New Testament, being swallowed up in the more endearing one of brother"—WESLEY.

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JUDE.

THE first words of this Epistle inform us that its author was the "brother of James." There can be little doubt that the James referred to was the first Bishop or Superintendent of the Church at Jerusalem, and that he and Jude were the persons mentioned by S. Paul as the "brethren of the Lord" (1 Cor. 9. 5).

Nothing is known as to the place where the Epistle was written, or the special circumstances which may have given occasion to it. The resemblance to a part of the Second Epistle of Peter is far too minute to be regarded as accidental; it is impossible to resist the conclusion that one of the two writers had the work of the other before him; yet, strange as it may appear, it seems equally impossible to decide which had the priority. In spite of the fact that S. Peter appears to predict a state of affairs which S. Jude describes as actually existing, the general opinion of modern critics is that S. Jude's Epistle was written first. Another difference has been pointed out. S. Peter speaks of "false teachers," while S. Jude speaks only of "certain men crept in." Perhaps, however, this difference appears greater to us, accustomed to the orderly arrangements of modern Churches, than it did to the primitive Christians. Among them, at least at Corinth, there seems to have been great liberty of speech (1 Cor. 14. 26), and men who acted in the manner denounced by S. Jude would probably try to explain their views, and to justify their conduct, in the assemblies of the Church.

In this Epistle there are some things hard to be understood. The references to Jewish legends unauthenticated by Old Testament Scripture, and the quotation apparently made from the apocryphal "Book of Enoch," peculiarities which, for a while, stood in the way of its reception into the Canon of Scripture, still present difficult problems to the candid expositor. The general object, however, is perfectly clear. It is well characterised by Alford as an impassioned invective, in the impetuous whirlwind of which the writer is hurried along, collecting example after example of Divine vengeance on the ungodly; heaping epithet upon epithet, and piling image upon image, and, as it were, labouring for words and images strong enough to depict the polluted character of the licentious apostates against whom he is warning the Church; returning again and again to the subject, as though all language was insufficient to give an adequate idea of their profligacy, and to express his burning hatred of their perversion of the doctrines of the gospel.

Vers. 1, 2. THE INSCRIPTION.—1. Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ—"the highest glory which any, either angel or man, can aspire to. The word 'servant,' under the old covenant, was adapted to the spirit of fear and bondage that clave to that dispensation. But when the time appointed of the Father was come, for the sending of His Son to redeem them that were under the Law, the word 'servant' (used by the apostles concerning themselves and all the children of God) signified one that, having the Spirit of adoption, is made free by the Son of God. His being a servant is the fruit and perfection of His being a Son. And whenever the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in the new Jerusalem, then will it be indeed that 'His servants shall serve Him' (Rev. 22. 3). The brother of James—S. James was the more eminent, usually styled, 'the brother of the Lord.' To them that are beloved. The conclusion (ver. 21) exactly answers the introduction. And preserved through Jesus Christ—so both the spring and the accomplishment of salvation are pointed out. This is premised, lest any of them should be discouraged by the terrible things which are afterwards mentioned. And called—to receive the whole blessing of God, in time and eternity"—WESLEY.

"When we ask what James is meant, the answer cannot be doubtful; it is James the brother of the Lord, one of the three 'pillars' of the Jewish Christian Church, and author of the Epistle which bears his name. If it be argued that, had S. Jude been the brother of the Lord, he would have mentioned the fact, we may securely answer that he would not have done so. Religious feeling would deter him, as it did his brother James, in his Epistle, from mentioning this. The Ascension had altered all Christ's human relationships, and His brethren would shrink from claiming kinship, after the flesh, with His glorified body. Nowhere in primitive Christian literature is any authority claimed on the basis of nearness of kin to the Redeemer. He Himself had taught Christians how the lowliest of them might rise above the closest of such earthly ties (Luke 11. 27, 28); to be spiritually the servant of Jesus Christ was much more than being His actual brother"—E. For preserved in Jesus Christ, R.V. has "kept for Jesus Christ," omitting and called. (Luke 6. 16; Acts 1. 13; John 17. 11, 12, 15; 1 Pet. 1. 5; Rom. 1. 7.)

2. Mercy . . . be multiplied—"from this, and from the benedictions in the two Epistles of S. Peter, we learn that the benedictions in S. Paul's Epistles may be completed by adding the word 'multiplied'"—B. (1 Pet. 1. 2; 2 Pet. 1. 2.)

Vers. 3–16.—A WARNING AGAINST UNGODLY MEN IN THE CHURCH.—3. When I gave all diligence to write to you of the common salvation—"designed for all, and enjoyed by all believers. Here the design of the Epistle is expressed; the end of which exactly answers the beginning. It was needful to exhort you to contend earnestly—yet humbly, meekly, and lovingly; otherwise your contention will only hurt your cause, if not destroy your soul. For the faith—all the fundamental truths—once delivered—by God, to remain unvaried for ever"—WESLEY.

Once delivered (R.V. "Once for all delivered"). "The faith does not mean any set formula of articles of belief, nor the internal reception of Christian doctrine, but the substance of it; it is equivalent to what S. Paul and the Evangelists call the 'gospel.' This faith, or this gospel, has been once for all delivered to Christians; it is complete and final, and admits of no successors and no supplements (Gal. 1. 6–9)"—E. (Tit. 1. 4; Phil. 1. 27; 1 Tim. 1. 18; 6. 12; 2 Tim. 1. 13; 4. 7.)

4. There are certain men crept in, who were of old described before—"even as early as Enoch; of whom it was foretold, that by their wilful sins they would incur this condemnation—turning the grace of God—revealed in the gospel—into lasciviousness—into an occasion of more abandoned wickedness"—WESLEY.

Of old ordained to this condemnation (R.V. "Of old set forth unto," etc.). "The text, when rightly translated and understood, gives no support to extreme predestinarian views"—E. "Who long ago were publicly marked out for this punishment—that is, their characters, conduct, and end had been clearly described"—W. W. With this verse begins the marked resemblance between this Epistle and the central portion of the Second Epistle of S. Peter. On the question which writer was prior, there is very great diversity of opinion, and certainly much may be said on both sides; but the similarity, both in substance and in wording, is so great that it is evident one must have borrowed from the other. Probably some appearance in another scene of the same class of evils which one apostle had already described, led another apostle to repeat his warnings. "In all ages there have been men such as S. Jude here describes—nominal members of the Church who are nothing but a scandal to it, and professing Christians whose whole life is one flagrant denial of Christ. Such persons certainly trouble Christendom now"—E. Denying the only Lord God (R.V. "Denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ"). (Gal. 2. 4; 2 Pet. 2. 1; Rom. 9. 21, 22; 1 Pet. 2. 8; 2 Pet. 2. 10; Tit. 2. 11; Heb. 12. 15; Tit. 1. 16; 1 John 2. 22.)

5. "He afterwards destroyed—the far greater part of that very people whom He had once saved. Let none, therefore, presume upon past mercies, as if he was now out of danger"—WESLEY.

Though ye once knew this (R.V. "Though ye know all things once for all"). Them that believed not. "S. Jude does not mention the various sins committed by the Israelites in the wilderness, but sums up the whole in their unbelief, because it was the source of all their other sins"—B. So we read (Heb. 3. 19), "They were not able to enter in because of unbelief." (1 Cor. 10. 9; Num. 14. 29, 37; 26. 64; Ps. 106. 26.)

6. And the angels, who kept not their first dignity—"once assigned them under the Son of God—but voluntarily left their own habitation—then properly their own, by the free gift of God—He reserved—delivered to be kept—in everlasting chains under darkness—oh how unlike their own habitation! When these fallen angels came out of the hands of God, they were holy; else God made that which was evil: and, being holy, they were beloved of God; else He hated the image of His own spotless purity. But now He loves them no more; they are doomed to endless destruction (for if He loved them still, He would love what is sinful): and both His former love, and His present righteous and eternal displeasure towards the same work of His own hands, are because He changeth not; because He invariably loveth righteousness, and hateth iniquity"—WESLEY.

Kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation, He hath kept (R.V.). Recent commentators regard this passage as referring, not to the original rebellion of the angels, but to the rabbinical version of the event described (Gen. 6. 2). The story is in the Book of Enoch, also referred to in ver. 14. (See the note on the parallel passage, 2 Pet. 2. 4.) (John 8. 44; Rev. 20. 10.)

7. The cities which gave themselves over to fornication. "The word here means, 'unnatural lusts.' Are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire—that is, the vengeance which they suffered is an example or type of eternal fire"—WESLEY.

Having in like manner with these given themselves over to fornication (R.V.). "In saying that this sin was like that of the angels, it is clearly implied that in the latter case also there was a degradation of nature, such as is emphasised in Gen. 6. 4"—C. B. (Gen. 19. 24; Deut. 29. 23; 2 Pet. 2. 6.)

8. In like manner these dreamers—"sleeping and dreaming all their lives—despise authority—those that are invested with it by Christ, and made by Him the overseers of His flock. Rail at dignities—the apostle does not seem to speak of worldly dignities. These they had 'in admiration for the sake of gain' (ver. 16); but those holy men, who for the purity of their lives, the soundness of their doctrine, and the greatness of their labours in the work of the ministry, were duly honourable before God and all good men; and who were grossly vilified by those who turned the grace of God into lasciviousness. Probably they were the impure followers of Simon Magus, the same with the Gnostics and Nicolaitanes. (Rev. 2. 15)"—WESLEY.

These also in their dreamings defile the flesh, etc. "The participle represented by in their dreamings does not belong to defile the flesh exclusively, but to the other two clauses as well"—E. "The term aptly describes various kinds of mystics; many of whom, under the plea of spiritual perfection, have indulged in carnal pollutions, have held tenets subversive of all civil authority and constituted government, have formed degrading conceptions of heavenly glories or of glorified beings, as saints and angels, reducing the hope of the Church to the sensual delights of a Mohammedan paradise"—W. W. "The variety of interpretation as regards the two expressions dominion and dignities or 'glories' is remarkable. We may, with some hesitation, interpret 'dominion' or 'lordship,' of Christ or of God, and 'dignities' or 'glories,' of angels, remembering that either or both of these may include Christ's ministers and messengers on earth"—E. (2 Pet. 2. 10; Ex. 22. 28.)

9. Yet Michael. "It does not appear whether S. Jude learned this by any revelation or from ancient tradition. It suffices, that these things were not only true, but acknowledged as such by them to whom he wrote.

The archangel. This word occurs but once more in the sacred writings (1 Thess. 4. 16). So that whether there be one archangel only, or more, it is not possible for us to determine. When he disputed with the devil—at what time we know not—concerning the body of Moses. Possibly the devil would have discovered the place where it was buried, which God for wise reasons had concealed. Durst not bring even against him a railing accusation—though so far beneath him in every respect—but simply said (so great was his modesty!)—The Lord rebuke thee—I leave thee to the Judge of all"—WESLEY.

"Nothing is really known of the event alluded to, though reference has been made to Dan. 10. 13, 21; 12. 1. Others conclude that the reference is to Zech. 3. 1-3, and explain the body of Moses of the Jewish state under the dispensation of Moses, as 1 Cor. 12. 17, 'Ye are the body of Christ.' The fact stated in Deut. 34. 6 was either really or symbolically the topic of disputation. There are various Jewish legends on the subject, not worth mentioning"—W. W. (Dan. 10. 13; 12. 1; Rev. 12. 7; 2 Pet. 2. 11; Zech. 3. 2.)

10. But these—"without all shame—rail at the things of God which they know not—neither can know, having no spiritual senses. And the natural things, which they know—by their natural senses, they abuse into occasions of sin"—WESLEY.

Rail at whatsoever things they know not. (2 Pet. 2. 12.)

11. Woe unto them. "Of all the apostles S. Jude alone, and that in this single place, denounces a woe. S. Peter, to the same effect, pronounces them 'cursed children.' For they have gone in the way of Cain—the murderer—and ran greedily—lit. 'have been poured out,' like a torrent without banks—after the error of Balaam—the covetous false prophet—and perished in the gainsaying of Korah. Vengeance has overtaken them as it did Korah, rising up against those whom God had sent"—WESLEY.

The way of Cain—"living in hatred and malice while professing to worship God"—W. W. Perished in the gainsaying—"that is, 'the rebellion, and the principle from which it sprang.' Here, as in many passages of Scripture, a thing is said to have happened which was only to happen. This manner of speaking was employed to show the absolute certainty of the thing spoken of"—B. (Gen. 4. 5; 1 John 3. 12; Num. 22. 7, 21; 2 Pet. 2. 15; Num. 16. 1.)

12. These are spots — "blemishes — in your feasts of love—anciently observed in all the churches—feeding themselves without fear—without any fear of God, or jealousy over themselves. Twice dead—in sin, first by nature, and afterwards by apostasy. Plucked up by the roots—and so incapable of ever reviving"—WESLEY.

Hidden rocks in your love-feasts when they feast with you, shepherds that without fear feed themselves (R.V.). E. suggests, "These are they who are rocks in your love-feasts, feasting together without fear, pasturing their own selves." "There is no reason for assuming that these profligates set up as teachers or pastors. In this respect our Epistle differs from the Second Epistle of Peter, which refers to false teachers. We cannot doubt that when S. Jude wrote, the Eucharist was still part of the love-feast, as when S. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, and that S. Jude is here referring to a state of things very similar to that which S. Paul rebuked at Corinth. The love-feast symbolised the brotherhood of Christians. It was a simple meal, in which all met as equals, and the rich supplied the necessities of the poor. It would seem as if these profligates—(1) brought with them luxurious food, thus destroying the Christian simplicity of the meal; and (2) brought this, not for the benefit of all, but for their own private enjoyment, thus destroying the idea of Christian brotherhood and equality. The whole purpose of the love-feast was wrecked by these men. They were rocks in them"—E. Trees whose fruits withereth (R. V. "autumn trees"). "There is a striking climax in this description of the false teachers (professors); they were trees stripped of their leaves, and withering; they had no fruit, being barren that season; they were twice dead, having borne no fruit formerly; lastly, they were rooted out, as utterly barren"—B. (2 Pet. 2. 13; 1 Cor. 11. 21; Prov. 25. 14; 2 Pet. 2. 17; Eph. 4. 14; Matt. 15. 13.)

13. "Wandering stars—lit. 'planets,' which shine for a time, but have no light in themselves, and will be soon cast into utter darkness. Thus the apostle illustrates their desperate wickedness by comparisons drawn from the air, earth, sea, and heavens"—WESLEY.

"But planets and even comets have their orbits, to which they keep, so that they are symbols of Christian lives rather than of the course of the ungodly. More probably S. Jude means 'falling stars' or 'shooting stars,' which seem to leave their place in the heavens, where they are beautiful and useful, and to wander away into the darkness"—E. (Isa. 57. 20; Phil. 3. 19; 2 Pet. 2. 17.)

14. And of these also—"as well as these antediluvian sinners—Enoch—so early was the prophecy referred to (ver. 4)—the seventh from Adam. There were only five of the fathers between Adam and Enoch. (1 Chron. 1. 1.) The first coming of Christ was revealed to Adam; His second glorious coming to Enoch; and 'the seventh from Adam' foretold the things which will conclude the seventh age of the world. S. Jude might know this either from some ancient book or tradition, or immediate revelation. Behold—as if it were already mentioned, the Lord cometh!"—WESLEY.

15. To execute judgment. "Enoch herein looked beyond the Flood—upon all—sinners, in general. And to convict all the ungodly, in particular, of all the grievous things which ungodly sinners (a 'sinner' is bad; but the 'ungodly' who sin without fear are worse) have spoken against Him (vers. 8, 10), though they might not think all those speeches were 'against Him'"—WESLEY.

The words of the apostle leave it doubtful whether he derived his quotation from tradition or from writing; though the wide spread of the 'Book of Enoch' in the second century seems almost decisive in favour of the latter supposition. This remarkable book, evidently of Jewish origin, is believed to have been written about the beginning of the first century before Christ, but large fragments of a much earlier date were undoubtedly incorporated into the work. It was long unknown as a whole to European Christianity, though numerous references to it were found in the writings of the fathers. Three MSS., containing an Æthiopic translation, were brought by Bruce from Abyssinia in the year 1773; and it has since been published in various forms in England and in Germany. See Smith's Dictionary of Bible. "Though Moses has said nothing concerning Enoch's prophesying, yet by telling us that he was a person of such piety as to be translated to heaven without dying, he has warranted us to believe Jude's account of him, viz. that God employed him, as He did Noah, in reforming the wicked of the age in which he lived, and that He inspired him to deliver the prophecy of which Jude speaks"—B. (Gen. 5. 18; Deut. 33. 2; Dan. 7. 10; Zech. 14. 5; Matt. 25. 31; 2 Thess. 1. 7; Rev. 1. 7; 1 Sam. 2. 3; Ps. 31. 18; 94. 4; Mal. 3. 13.)

16. These are murmurers—"against men. Complainers—lit. 'complainers of' their fate, against God. Walking—with regard to themselves—after their own foolish and mischievous desires. Having men's persons in admiration for the sake of gain—admiring and commending them only for what they can get"—WESLEY.

Murmurers, complainers. "This seems to have been suggested by the last words of the prophecy quoted from Enoch: 'the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against Him.' The way in which the libertines spoke hard words against God was by murmuring against His decrees, and complaining of the dispensation of His providence. This is the exact meaning of the word translated 'complainers,' 'finding fault with their lot,' discontented with the condition of life which God had assigned to them, and not only blaming Him for this, but for the moral restrictions He has imposed upon mankind. Men who walk after their own lusts, and shape their course in accordance with these, cannot be contented; the lusts themselves are insatiable; even when gratification is possible, it is only temporary"—E. Great swelling words. "They set about getting rid of their duties and reconciling the service of God with the service of Satan, by roundly declaring that Christian liberty included freedom to gratify one's desires"—E. Having men's persons in admiration (R.V. "Showing respect of persons"). Rebelliously reject the plain commands of God, and yet servilely cringe to the humours and caprices of men—for the sake of advantage. (2 Pet. 28. 18; Prov. 28. 21; Jas. 2. 1, 9.)

Vers. 17-25. EXHORTATION TO THE FAITHFUL.—17. By the apostles. "He does not exempt himself from the number of apostles. For in the next verse he says, they told you, not us"—WESLEY.

"The resemblance between this text and 2 Pet. 3. 2 is very remarkable. It is such as would incline one to think that S. Jude had the text in S. Peter before him, and omitted what had peculiar reference to the former part of S. Peter's Epistle, and to which there was nothing in his own to answer. Though S. Jude only cites the words spoken by S. Peter, yet his exhortation being general, it includes the words spoken by other apostles concerning the coming of false teachers"—B. "The A.V. unfortunately obscures the close connection between the wording of 2 Pet. 3. 3 and this passage, by having mockers in the one, and scoffers in the other. But, in spite of the great similarity of wording, the meaning is very different. In the Second Epistle of Peter we are expressly told that they scoffed at the belief that Christ was coming to judge the world. There is no hint at such a notion here; on the contrary, it is implied that these libertines mocked at God's dealings with themselves, and at the belief that the gospel did not give them full liberty to gratify their sensual desires. They were among those of whom it is written that 'fools make a mock at sin.' By scoffing at things sacred, and ridiculing the notion that there is any harm in licentiousness, they created a moral atmosphere in which men sinned with a light heart, because sin was made to look as if it were a matter of no moment. It would be more reasonable and less reprehensible to make a mock at carnage or pestilence, and teach men to go with a light heart into a desolating war or a plague-stricken neighbourhood"—E. (2 Pet. 3. 2; 1 Tim. 4. 1; 2 Tim. 3. 1; 4. 3; 2 Pet. 2. 1; 3. 3.)

19. These are they who separate themselves, sensual, not having the Spirit—"having natural senses and understanding only, not the Spirit of God; otherwise they could not 'separate.' For that it is a sin, and a very heinous one, 'to separate from the Church,' is out of all question. But then it should be observed—(1) that by 'the Church' is meant a body of living Christians, who are

'an habitation of God through the Spirit'; (2) that by 'separating' is understood renouncing all religious intercourse with them; no longer joining with them in solemn prayer, or the other public offices of religion; and (3) that we have no more authority from Scripture to call even this schism, than to call it murder"—WESLEY.

These are they who make separations (R.V.), the word themselves being omitted in the best MSS. "They do not actually make a schism from the Church, for they frequent the love-feasts and profess membership, but they create a faction within it. Worst of all, they claim to be specially enlightened members of the Church, having a more comprehensive knowledge of the nature of Christian liberty, while they are turning the fundamental principles of Christian life upside down"—E. (Prov. 18. 1; Ezek. 14. 7; Hos. 4. 14; 9. 10; Heb. 10. 25; 1 Cor. 2. 14; Jas. 3. 15.)

20. "But ye, beloved, not separating, but building yourselves up in your most holy faith—than which none can be more holy in itself, or more conducive to the most refined and exalted holiness. Praying through the Holy Spirit—who alone is able to build you up, as He alone laid the foundation. In this and the following verse S. Jude mentions the Father, Son, and Spirit, together with faith, love, and hope"—WESLEY.

"The faith is not the internal grace or virtue, but, as both the participle and the adjective show, 'the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints.' It is most holy in contrast to the vile and shifty doctrines which the libertines profess. Praying in the Holy Ghost. For in order that we may pray aright, He must move our hearts and direct our petitions"—E. (Col. 2. 7; 1 Tim. 1. 4; Rom. 8. 26; Eph. 6. 18.)

21. "By these means, through His grace, keep yourselves in the love of God, and in the confident expectation of that eternal life which is purchased for you, and conferred upon you, through the mere mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ"—WESLEY.

In the love of God—"that is, in love to God, arising from a sense of His love toward you"—B. "The concise statement of the relations of the Persons of the blessed Trinity to believers must not be overlooked. By prayer in the power of the Holy Spirit we are kept in the love of the Father, through the mercy of the Son"—E. (Tit. 2. 13; 2 Pet. 3. 12.)

22, 23. And on some have mercy, who are in doubt; and some save, snatching them out of the fire; and on some have mercy with fear (R.V.). In hardly any passage does the R.V. differ in so many particulars from A.V. Mr. Wesley's version agrees with R.V., excepting in the first clause, which he translates, some, that are wavering, convince, adopting a reading of the Greek which is advocated also by E. in our own day. His note, which follows, is characteristic in its force and terseness: "Meantime watch over others, as well as yourselves, and give them such help as their various needs require. For instance—(1) Some, that are wavering in judgment, staggered by others or by their own evil reasoning, endeavour more deeply to convince of the whole truth as it is in Jesus. (2) Some snatch, with a swift and strong hand, out of the fire of sin and temptation. (3) On others show compassion in a milder and gentler way; though still with a jealous fear, lest yourselves be infected with the disease you endeavour to cure. See, therefore, that while you love the sinners, ye retain the utmost abhorrence of their sins, and of any the least degree of, or approach to them"—WESLEY.

Hating even the garment. In dealing with evil so insidious and so infectious, we must take care that we are not contaminated ourselves. The garment mentioned is the chiton, which came in contact with the body; it therefore serves well as a symbol for that which has become perilous through being connected with evil. While the evil is to be hated, compassion is to be shown to those who have fallen victims to it; but in some cases this sympathy must be manifested in fear. (Rom. 11. 14; 1 Tim. 4. 16; Amos 4. 11; 1 Cor. 3. 15; Zech. 3. 2; 3. 4, 5; Rev. 3. 4.)

24. Now to Him who alone is able to keep them from falling—"into any of these errors or sins—and to present them faultless in the presence of His glory—that is, in His own presence, when He shall be revealed in all His glory"—WESLEY.

To guard you from stumbling, and to set you before the presence of His glory without blemish (R.V.). "To guard from stumbling" is much more than to keep from falling; and the word translated "without blemish" referred to the perfection of a sacrifice. To the only God our Saviour (R.V.). S. Paul, like S. Jude, speaks of God the Father as our Saviour. (1 Tim. 1. 1; 2. 3; Tit. 3. 4–6.) "The work of the Son is the work of the Father. God is our Saviour, 'through Jesus Christ our Lord.' Before all time, and now, and for evermore—evil men in their dreamings may 'set at nought dominion and rail at glories,' and their mouth may 'speak great swelling words' about their own superior knowledge and greater liberty, and may mock and scoff at those who will not follow them in 'walking after their own ungodly lusts.' Nevertheless, ages before they were born, and ages after they shall have vanished from the world which they are troubling by their presence, glory, majesty, dominion, and power belong to Him who saves us, and would save even them, through Jesus Christ our Lord"—E.

THE REVELATION OF S. JOHN THE DIVINE.

IT is not without diffidence that any candid student ventures to present even a series of notes on this remarkable book. So many commentaries have been written and forgotten; so many interpretations, more or less confidently advanced, have been discredited by the lapse of time, that the humblest attempt to follow in the same course appears to need apology. In fact, the reader will find before him in the present instance, not so much a scheme of interpretation, as an assemblage of material from various quarters, designed to illustrate the text, and to enable him, if he see fit, to form such a scheme for himself.

There appears no reasonable ground to doubt the well-nigh universal judgment of the Church from the earliest ages, that John, Apostle and Evangelist, was the author of this book; that, having for many years resided at Ephesus and exercised apostolic authority over the churches of Asia, he was banished for a time, in consequence of an outbreak of persecution in the reign of the Emperor Domitian, to the isle of Patmos; that in the comparative loneliness of that little island these wonderful visions were displayed to him, and, without needless delay, reduced to writing.

The general object of the book appears scarcely to admit of dispute. It was, in the first place, to admonish the churches, by suitable messages sent to the seven representative churches of Asia; and in the second place, and especially, to stimulate and encourage the churches by the assurance of the victorious advent of their Lord, and of the eternal happiness of His faithful people. This advent they are not taught to expect immediately, but at the close of a lengthened period of suffering and conflict, in which it might be their duty to resist unto blood, striving against sin. The whole teaching of the book suggests a patient faith in the ultimate triumph of truth and righteousness, a faith which need not waver, even if falsehood and wrong seem to be enthroned like the harlot of the vision in the irresistible supremacy of the imperial power, and to be defended by eloquence and subtlety like that of the false prophet. The lesson was needed then, by the Christian subjects of the Roman empire, and it survives in its imperishable truth to cheer us in the conflicts of the present day.

The interpretation of the wonderful visions by which that period of conflict is described is the commentator's difficulty. He may well say with Mr. Wesley, "I by no means pretend to understand, or to explain, all that is contained in this mysterious book. I only offer what help I can to the serious inquirer," even if he does not add with the learned Clarke, 'This book is called a Revelation, but it is a revelation of symbols, an exhibition of enigmas, to which no particular solution is given, and to which God alone can give the solution." Whether the reader would prefer the theory of the preterists, who refer the whole of the visions to events long past; or of the futurists, who defer them to the final years of the present dispensation; or of the numerous continuous historical interpreters; or, finally, of those more modern commentators who regard them as descriptive, less of events that happen once and no more, than of principles in the Divine government, destined to find repeated illustration in the history of the Church and of the world, may depend upon his personal character and his intellectual training. To us it appears a matter of infinitely greater importance to recognise the truth which lies upon the surface of every chapter, that this world is a battlefield between awful powers of good and evil; that every one of us has a part in the conflict, and will ultimately share the results of victory or of defeat, and that Christ, the King of kings, is reigning now, and must reign for ever.

CHAPTER I.

Vers. 1-3. THE PREFACE.—1. The Revelation—"properly so called; for things covered before are here revealed, or unveiled. No prophecy in the Old Testament has this title; it was reserved for this alone in the New. It is, as it were, a manifesto, wherein the Heir of all things declares that all power is given Him in heaven and earth, and that He will in the end gloriously exercise that power, maugre all the opposition of all His enemies. Of Jesus Christ—not of 'John the Divine,' a title added in later ages. Certain it is, that appellation, the Divine, was not brought into the Church, much less was it affixed to John the Apostle, till long after the apostolic age. It was S. John, indeed, who wrote this book, but the author of it is Jesus Christ. Which God gave unto Him—according to His holy, glorified humanity, as the great Prophet of the Church. God gave the Revelation to Jesus Christ; Jesus Christ made it known to His servants. To show. This word recurs in ch. 22. 6, and in many places the parts of this book refer to each other. Indeed, the whole structure of it breathes the art of God, comprising, in the most finished compendium, things to come, many, various; near, intermediate, remote; the greatest, the least; terrible, comfortable; old, new; long, short; and these interwoven together, opposite, composite; relative to each other at a small, at a great distance; and therefore sometimes, as it were, disappearing, broken off, suspended, and afterwards unexpectedly and most seasonably appearing again. In all its parts it has an admirable variety, with the most exact harmony, beautifully illustrated by those very digressions which seem to interrupt it. In this manner does it display the manifold wisdom of God shining in the economy of the Church through so many ages. His servants. Much is comprehended in this appellation. It is a great thing to be a servant of Jesus Christ. This book is dedicated particularly to the servants of Christ in the seven churches in Asia; but not exclusive of all His other servants, in all nations and ages. It is one single revelation, and yet sufficient for them all, from the time it was written to the end of the world. Serve thou the Lord Jesus Christ in truth; so shalt thou learn His secret in this book; yea, and thou shalt feel in thy heart whether this book be Divine, or not. The things which must shortly come to pass. The things contained in this prophecy did begin to be accomplished shortly after it was given; and the whole might be said to come to pass shortly, in the same sense as S. Peter says, 'The end of all things is at hand,' and our Lord Himself, 'Behold, I come quickly.' There is in this book a rich treasure of all the doctrines pertaining to faith and holiness. But these are also delivered in other parts of Holy Writ; so that the Revelation need not to have been given for the sake of these. The peculiar design of this is, to show the things which must come to pass. And this we are specially to have before our eyes whenever we read or hear it. It is said afterward, 'Write what thou seest,' and again, 'Write what thou hast seen, and what is, and what shall be hereafter'; but here, where the scope of the book is shown, it is only said, the things which must come to pass. Accordingly, the showing things to come is the great point in view throughout the whole. And S. John writes what he has seen, and what is, only as it has an influence on, or gives light to, what shall be. And He—Jesus Christ—sent and signified them—showed them by signs or emblems; so the Greek word properly means. By His angel—peculiarly called, in the sequel, 'the angel of God,' and particularly mentioned, ch. 17. 1; 21. 9; 22. 6, 16. To His servant John—a title given to no other single person throughout the book"—WESLEY.

Of Jesus Christ. "Jesus Christ is the author of the Apocalypse. He taught many things before His departure; but those which were unsuitable for announcement at that time He brought together into the Apocalypse"—BENGEL. (John 3. 32; 8. 26; 12. 49; 14. 1; ver. 3; 22. 16.)

2. Who hath testified—"in the following book. The word of God—given directly by God. And the testimony of Jesus—which He hath left us, as the faithful and true Witness. Whatsoever things He saw—in such a manner as was a full confirmation of the Divine original of this book"—WESLEY.

"It is observable that the historical books of the Old Testament have not always the name of the historian prefixed to them, but in the prophetical books the name is always prefixed. So in the New Testament, though S. John did not prefix his name to his First Epistle, yet he does to this prophecy, as ready to vouch and answer for the truth of it"—M. H. (1 Cor. 1. 6; 6. 9; 12. 17; ver. 9; 1 John 1. 1.)

3. Happy is he that readeth, and they that hear, the words of this prophecy. "Some have miserably handled this book. Hence others are afraid to touch it; and, while they desire to know all things else, reject only the knowledge of those which God hath shown. They inquire after anything rather than this, as if it were written, 'Happy is he that doth not read this prophecy.' Nay, but 'happy is he that readeth, and they that hear, and keep the words thereof'—especially at this time, when so considerable a part of them is on the point of being fulfilled. Nor are helps wanting whereby any sincere and diligent inquirer may understand what he reads therein. The book itself is written in the most accurate manner possible. It distinguishes the several things whereof it treats by seven epistles, seven seals, seven trumpets, seven vials; each of which sevens is divided into four and three. Many things the book itself explains—as the seven stars, the seven candlesticks, the Lamb, His seven horns and seven eyes; the incense, the dragon, the heads and horns of the beasts, the fine linen, the testimony of Jesus; and much light arises from comparing it with the ancient prophecies, and the predictions in the other books of the New Testament. In this book our Lord has comprised what was wanting in those prophecies touching the time which followed His ascension and the end of the Jewish polity. Accordingly, it reaches from the old Jerusalem to the new, reducing all things into one sum, in the exactest order, and with a near resemblance to the ancient prophets. The introduction and conclusion agree with Daniel; the description of the man child, and the promises to Sion, with Isaiah; the judgment of Babylon, with Jeremiah; again, the determination of times, with Daniel; the architecture of the holy city, with Ezekiel; the emblems of the horses, candlesticks, etc., with Zechariah. Many things largely described by the prophets are here summarily repeated; and frequently in the same words. To them we may then usefully have recourse. Yet the Revelation suffices for the explaining itself, even if we do not yet understand those prophecies; yea, it casts much light upon them. Frequently, likewise, where there is a resemblance between them, there is a difference also; the Revelation, as it were, taking a stock from one of the old prophets, and inserting a new graft into it. Thus Zechariah speaks of two olive trees; and so does S. John, but with a different meaning. Daniel has a beast with ten horns; so has S. John, but not with quite the same signification. And here the difference of words, emblems, things, times, ought studiously to be observed. Our Lord foretold many things before His passion; but not all things, for it was not yet seasonable. Many things, likewise, His Spirit foretold in the writings of the apostles, so far as the necessities of those times required: now He comprises them all in one short book; therein presupposing all the other prophecies, and at the same time explaining, continuing, and perfecting them in one thread. It is right, therefore, to compare them; but not to measure the fulness of these by the scantiness of those preceding. Christ, when on earth, foretold what would come to pass in a short time; adding a brief description of the last things. Here He foretells the intermediate things; so that both put together constitute one complete chain of prophecy. This book is therefore not only the sum and the key of all the prophecies which preceded, but likewise a supplement to all: the seals being closed before. Of consequence, it contains many particulars not revealed in any other part of Scripture. They have therefore little gratitude to God for such a revelation, reserved for the exaltation of Christ, who boldly reject whatever they find here which was not revealed, or not so clearly, in other parts of Scripture. He that readeth and they that hear. S. John probably sent this book by a single person into Asia, who read it in the churches, while many heard. But this, likewise, in a secondary sense, refers to all that shall duly read or hear it in all ages. The words of this prophecy. It is a revelation with regard to Christ who gives it; a prophecy, with regard to S. John who delivers it to the churches. And keep the things which are written therein—in such a manner as the nature of them requires—namely, with repentance, faith, patience, prayer, obedience, watchfulness, constancy. It behoves every Christian, at all opportunities, to read what is written in the oracles of God; and to read this precious book in particular, frequently, reverently, and attentively. For the time — of its beginning to be accomplished—is near—even when S. John wrote. How much nearer to us is even the full accomplishment of this weighty prophecy"—WESLEY.

He that readeth and they that hear. "Plainly the author of the book, or of this endorsement of it, contemplates its being read publicly in the church. The apostolic Epistles were thus read, first by the churches to which they were addressed, and afterwards by others in the neighbourhood. (Col. 4. 16.) In the course of the second century, both the Gospels and the apostolic Epistles came to be read in churches generally, as the Law and the Prophets had been read in the synagogues. In the time of Justin Martyr (Apol. 1. 67), not to insist on 1 Tim. 5. 18; 2 Pet. 3. 16, it is plain that the New Testament Scriptures were thus recognised as sharing the authority and sanctity of the Old"—C. B. (Luke 11. 28; 22. 7, 10; Rom. 13. 11; 1 Pet. 4. 7.)

Vers. 4–6. THE DEDICATION. — 4. John. "The dedication of this book is contained in the fourth, fifth, and sixth verses; but the whole Revelation is a kind of letter. To the seven churches which are in Asia—that part of the Lesser Asia which was then a Roman province. There had been several other churches planted here; but it seems these were now the most eminent; and it was among these that S. John had laboured most during his abode in Asia. In these cities there were many Jews. Such of them as believed in each were joined with the Gentile believers in one church. Grace be unto you, and peace—the favour of God, with all temporal and eternal blessings—from Him who is, and who was, and who cometh, or, who is to come—a wonderful translation of the great name JEHOVAH: He 'was' of old, He 'is' now, He 'cometh,' that is, will be for ever. And from the seven Spirits which are before His throne—Christ is He who 'hath the seven Spirits of God.' 'The seven lamps which burn before the throne are the seven Spirits of God.' 'The Lamb hath seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God.' 'Seven' was a sacred number in the Jewish Church; but it did not always imply a precise number. It sometimes is to be taken figuratively, to denote completeness or perfection. By these 'seven Spirits' not seven created angels, but the Holy Ghost, is to be understood. The angels are never termed 'spirits' in this book; and when all the angels stand up, while the four living creatures and the four and twenty elders worship Him that sitteth on the throne, and the Lamb, 'the seven Spirits' neither stand up nor worship. To these 'seven Spirits of God,' the seven churches, to whom the Spirit speaks so many things, are subordinate; as are also their angels, yea, and 'the seven angels which stand before God.' He is called 'the seven Spirits,' not with regard to His essence, which is one, but with regard to His manifold operations"—WESLEY.

Seven churches. "The number of course is symbolical or representative; there were other churches in Asia, but the seven churches represent 'the holy Church throughout the world.' It was very early observed, that S. Paul also wrote to seven churches, the Thessalonians, Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, Philippians, Ephesians, and Colossians"—C. B. From Him which is. This may be compared with the celebrated inscription in the temple of the Egyptian Isis, "I am all that has come into being, and that which is, and that which shall be; and no man hath lifted my veil." The heathen inscription identifies God with the universe, the Christian describes a personal, everlasting, and self-revealing God. (Ex. 3. 14; ver. 8; John 1. 1; Zech. 3. 9; 4. 10; ch. 3. 1; 4. 5; 5. 6.)

5. And from Jesus Christ, the Faithful Witness, the First-begotten from the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth. "Three glorious appellations are here given Him, and in their proper order. He was 'the faithful Witness' of the whole will of God before His death, and in death, and remains such in glory. He rose from the dead, as 'the first-fruits of them that slept,' and now hath all power both in heaven and earth. He is here styled a 'Prince'; but by and by He bears His title of King; yea, 'King of kings, and Lord of lords.' This phrase, 'the kings of the earth,' signifies their power and multitude, and also the nature of their kingdom. It became the Divine Majesty to call them kings with a limitation; especially in this manifesto from His heavenly kingdom; for no creature, much less a sinful man, can bear the title of king in an absolute sense before the eyes of God"—WESLEY.

"He mentions Him after the Spirit, contrary to the usual order of the Persons in the Trinity, because he intends to enlarge more upon the Person of Christ, as God manifested in the flesh, whom he had seen dwelling on earth before, and now saw again in a glorious form"—M. H. (John 8. 14; 1 Tim. 6. 13; ch. 3. 14; 1 Cor. 15. 20; Col. 1. 18; Eph. 1. 20; ch. 17. 14; 19. 16; John 13. 34; ch. 15. 9; Gal. 2. 20.)

6. "To Him that loveth us, and, out of that free, abundant love, hath washed us from the guilt and power of our sins with His own blood, and hath made us kings—partakers of His present, and heirs of His eternal, kingdom—and priests unto His God and Father—to whom we continually offer ourselves an holy, living sacrifice. To Him be the glory—for His love and redemption. And the might—whereby He governs all things"—WESLEY.

Hath washed us. R.V. renders "loosed us," but gives the rendering "washed" in the margin. The difference is that of a single letter in the Greek word, found in some MSS., but not in the best. The A.V. represents the blood of Christ as the cleansing fountain described in Zech. 13. 1; the R.V. represents it as the price of our redemption from the power and penalty of sin. Kings and priests (R.V. "A kingdom, to be priests"). The reference evidently is to Ex. 19. 6. God and His Father (R.V. "His God and Father"). So Christ while on earth said, "My Father and your Father, My God and your God" (John 20. 17), and in His exaltation He said, "I will write on him the name of My God" (ch. 3. 12). (Heb. 9. 14; 1 John 1. 7; 1 Pet. 2. 5, 9; ch. 5. 10; 20. 6; 1 Tim. 6. 16; Heb. 13. 21; 1 Pet. 4. 11; ch. 5. 11.)

Vers. 7–20. THE VISION OF CHRIST.—7. Behold. "In this and the next verse is the proposition and summary of the whole book. He cometh—Jesus Christ. Throughout this book, whenever it is said, 'He cometh,' it means His glorious coming. The preparation for this began at the destruction of Jerusalem, and more particularly at the time of writing this book; and goes on without any interruption, till that grand event is accomplished. Therefore it is never said in this book, He will come; but He cometh. And yet it is not said, He cometh again, for when He came before it was not like Himself, but in 'the form of a servant.' But His appearing in glory is properly His coming, namely, in a manner worthy of the Son of God. And every eye—of the Jews in particular — shall see Him—but with what different emotions, according as they had received or rejected Him! And they who have pierced Him—they, above all, who pierced His hands, or feet, or side. S. Thomas saw the print of these wounds even after His resurrection; and the same, undoubtedly, will be seen by all, when He cometh in the clouds of heaven. And all the tribes of the earth. The word 'tribes,' in the Revelation, always means the Israelites; but where another word, such as 'nations' or 'people,' is joined with it, it implies likewise (as here) all the rest of mankind. Shall wail because of Him—for terror and pain, if they did not wail before by true repentance. Yea, Amen. This refers to 'every eye shall see Him.' He that cometh saith, 'Yea'; He that testifies it, 'Amen.' The word translated 'yea' is Greek, 'Amen' is Hebrew; for what is here spoken respects both Jew and Gentile"—WESLEY.

With clouds (R.V. "With the clouds"). His coming again will be in like manner with the Ascension. (Acts 1. 11.) They also that pierced Him. S. John is the only Evangelist who records the piercing of Christ's side. The allusion identifies him as the author of this book. The incident was recorded, because it established the reality of Christ's humanity and His death. "While the words are taken from Zechariah (ch. 12. 10), the thought is rather that of Matt. 26. 64. They which pierced Him are thought of, not as looking to Him by faith, and mourning for Him in penitence, but as seeing Him whom they had not believed in, and mourning in despair"—C. B. (Dan 7. 13; Matt. 24. 30; ch. 26. 64; Acts 1. 11; John 19. 37.)

8. I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God. "'Alpha' is the first, 'Omega,' the last letter in the Greek alphabet. Let His enemies boast and rage ever so much in the intermediate time, yet the Lord God is both 'the Alpha,' or beginning, and 'the Omega,' or end, of all things. God is the beginning, as He is the Author and Creator of all things, and as He proposes, declares, and promises so great things; He is the end, as He brings all the things which are here revealed to a complete and glorious conclusion. Again, the beginning and end of a thing is in Scripture styled the whole thing. Therefore God is 'the Alpha and the Omega,' the beginning and the end; that is, one who is all things, and always the same"—WESLEY.

I am the Alpha and the Omega, saith the Lord God (R.V.). "In Christ, Genesis the Alpha of the Old Testament and Revelation the Omega of the New Testament, meet together; the last book presenting to us man and God reconciled in paradise, as the first book presented man at the beginning innocent and in God's favour in paradise. Accomplishing finally what I begin. An anticipatory consolation to the saints in the coming trials of the Church"—P. (Isa. 41. 4; 44. 6; 48. 12; ver. 17; ch. 2. 8; 21. 6; 22. 13; ver. 11; ver. 4; ch. 4. 8; 11. 17; 16. 5.)

9. I John. "The instruction and preparation of the apostle for the work are described from the ninth to the twentieth verse. Your brother—in the common faith—and companion in the affliction—for the same persecution which carried him to Patmos drove them into Asia. This book peculiarly belongs to those who are under the cross. It was given to a banished man; and men in affliction understand and relish it most. Accordingly, it was little esteemed by the Asiatic church, after the time of Constantine; but highly valued by all the African churches, as it has been since by all the persecuted children of God. In the affliction, and kingdom and patience of Jesus. The kingdom stands in the midst. It is chiefly under various afflictions that faith obtains its part in the kingdom; and whosoever is a partaker of this kingdom is not afraid to suffer for Jesus. (2 Tim. 2. 12.) I was in the island Patmos—in the reign of Domitian and of Nerva. And there he saw and wrote all that follows. It was a place peculiarly proper for these visions. He had over against him, at a small distance, Asia and the seven churches; going on eastward, Jerusalem and the land of Canaan; and, beyond this, Antioch, yea, the whole continent of Asia. To the west, he had Rome, Italy, and all Europe, swimming, as it were, in the sea; to the south, Alexandria and the Nile with its outlets, Egypt, and all Africa; and to the north, what was afterwards called Constantinople, on the straits between Europe and Asia. So he had all the three parts of the world which were then known, with all Christendom, as it were, before his eyes; a large theatre for all the various scenes which were to pass before him; as if this island had been made principally for this end, to serve as an observatory for the apostle. For preaching the word of God he was banished thither, and for the testimony of Jesus—for testifying that He is the Christ"—WESLEY.

"Patmos is one of the Sporades, the south-eastern group of the islands of the Ægean. According to the tradition, as given by Victorinus, he was condemned to work in the mines — which, if trustworthy, must mean marble quarries, as there are no mines, strictly speaking, in the island. The tradition is probably right: 'deportation,' confinement without hard labour on a lonely island, was then and afterwards reserved for offenders of higher secular rank"—C. B. (Phil. 1. 7; ch. 4. 14; 2 Tim. 1. 8; Rom. 8. 17; 2 Tim. 2. 12; ch. 6. 9; ver. 2.)

10. I was in the Spirit—"that is, in a trance, a prophetic vision; so overwhelmed with the power, and filled with the light of the Holy Spirit, as to be insensible of outward things, and wholly taken up with spiritual and Divine. What follows is one single, connected vision, which S. John saw in one day; and therefore he that would understand it should carry his thought straight on through the whole without interruption. The other prophetic books are collections of distinct prophecies, given upon various occasions; but here is one single treatise, whereof all the parts exactly depend on each other. Ch. 4. 1 is connected with ch. 1. 19; and what is delivered in the fourth chapter goes on directly to the twenty-second. On the Lord's day. On this our Lord rose from the dead; on this the ancients believed He will come to judgment. It was, therefore, with the utmost propriety that S. John on this day both saw and described His coming. And I heard behind me—S. John had his face to the east; our Lord, likewise, in this appearance looked eastward towards Asia, whither the apostle was to write —a great voice, as of a trumpet—which was peculiarly proper to proclaim the coming of the great King, and His victory over all His enemies"—WESLEY.

On the Lord's day. Though forcibly detained from communion with the brethren in the sanctuary on the Lord's Day, the weekly commemoration of the resurrection, S. John was holding spiritual communion with them. This is the first mention of the term, "the Lord's Day." But the consecration of the day to worship, almsgiving, and the Lord's Supper, is implied in Acts 20. 7; 1 Cor. 16. 2; the term corresponds to the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11. 20). (Acts 10. 10; 2 Cor. 12. 2; ch. 4. 2; 17. 3; 21. 10; John 20. 26; Acts 20. 7; 1 Cor. 16. 2.)

11. Saying . . . What thou seest—"and hearest. He both saw and heard. This command extends to the whole book. All the books of the New Testament were written by the will of God; but none were so expressly commanded to be written. In a book. So all the Revelation is but one book; nor did the letter to the angel of each church belong to him or his church only; but the whole book was sent to them all. To the churches—hereafter named; and through them to all churches, in all ages and nations. To Ephesus. Mr. Thomas Smith, who, in the year 1671, travelled through all these cities, observes that from Ephesus to Smyrna is forty-six English miles; from Smyrna to Pergamos, sixty-four; from Pergamos to Thyatira, forty-eight; from Thyatira to Sardis, thirty-three; from Sardis to Philadelphia, twenty-seven; from Philadelphia to Laodicea, about forty-two miles"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits the clause, I am Alpha and Omega, and gives the name Pergamum instead of Pergamos. These seven churches are representative churches, and as a complex whole, ideally complete, embody the chief spiritual characteristics of the Church, whether as faithful or unfaithful, in all ages. (Ch. 4. 1; 10. 8; vers. 8, 17.)

12, 13. And I turned to see the voice—"that is, to see Him whose voice it was. And being turned, I saw. It seems, the vision presented itself gradually. First, he heard a voice; and, upon looking behind, he saw the golden candlesticks, and then, in the midst of the candlesticks, which were placed in a circle, he saw one like a Son of man—that is, in a human form. As a man likewise our Lord doubtless appears in heaven; though not exactly in this symbolical manner, wherein He presents Himself as the Head of His Church. He next observed that our Lord was clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt with a golden girdle. Such the Jewish high priests wore. But both of them are here marks of royal dignity likewise. Girt about at the breast. He that is on a journey girds his loins. Girding the breast was an emblem of solemn rest. It seems that the apostle having seen all this, looked up to behold the face of our Lord; but was beat back by the appearance of His flaming eyes, which occasioned his more particularly observing His feet. Receiving strength to raise his eyes again, he saw the stars in His right hand, and the sword coming out of His mouth; but upon beholding the brightness of His glorious countenance, which probably was much increased since the first glance the apostle had of it, 'he fell at His feet as dead.' During the time that S. John was discovering these several particulars, our Lord seems to have been speaking. And doubtless even His voice, at the very first, bespoke the God; though not so insupportably as His glorious appearance"—WESLEY.

Like a Son of man (R.V.), giving, however, "the Son of man" in the margin. "There is no article with either noun in the Greek; while in the title of our Lord, 'the Son of man' in the Gospels, it is expressed with both. The inference is, not that our Lord was not intended, but that the title is taken, not from His own use of it, but direct from the Greek of Dan. 7. 13, where also the article is absent. The words of themselves mean no more than 'I saw a human figure,' but their associations make it plain to any one acquainted with the Book of Daniel that it was a superhuman Being in human form; and to a Christian, of S. John's days as of our own, who that Being was"—C. B. Down to the foot. The garment and girdle seem to be emblems of His priesthood. His being in the midst of the candlesticks, seen only in the Temple, shows that it is as King-Priest He is so attired. This priesthood He has exercised ever since His ascension, and therefore He now wears its emblems. The ordinary girding for one actively engaged was at the loins, but Josephus expressly tells us that the Levitical priests were girt higher up, about the breasts or "paps," appropriate to calm, majestic movement. The high priest's girdle was interwoven with gold, but Christ's is all of gold; the Antitype exceeds the type. (Ex. 25. 37; Zech. 4. 2; ch. 2. 1; Ezek. 1. 26; Dan. 7. 13; ch. 10. 16; 14. 14; Dan. 10. 5; ch. 15. 6.)

14. His head and His hair—"that is, the hair of His head, not His whole head—were white as white wool—like the Ancient of Days represented in Daniel's vision. (Dan. 7. 9.) Wool is commonly supposed to be an emblem of eternity. As snow—betokening His spotless purity. And His eyes as a flame of fire—piercing through all things; a token of His omniscience"—WESLEY.

"Though the Person seen is the Son of Man, the description is that of the Ancient of Days (Dan. 7.). We need not wonder that their union was made plainer to the later prophet"—C. B. Eyes as a flame of fire—all searching and penetrating; at the same time, also, implying consuming indignation against sin (see ch. 19. 12). (Dan. 7. 9; 10. 6; ch. 2. 18.)

15. And His feet like fine brass — "denoting His stability and strength. As if they burned in a furnace — as if, having been melted and refined, they were still red hot. And His voice—to the comfort of His friends, and the terror of His enemies—as the voice of many waters—roaring aloud, and bearing down all before them"—WESLEY.

Burnished brass . . . refined in a furnace (R.V.). The feet of the priests were bare, in ministering in the sanctuary. So our great High Priest here. His voice. "He can and will make Himself heard, by those that are afar off as well as by those that are nigh"—M. H. (Ezek. 1. 7; Dan. 10. 6; ch. 2. 18; 14. 2; 19. 6; Ezek. 43. 2.)

16. And He had in His right hand seven stars—"in token of His favour and powerful protection. And out of His mouth went a sharp two-edged sword — signifying His justice and righteous anger, continually pointed against His enemies as a sword; sharp, to stab; two-edged, to hew. And His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength—without any mist or cloud"—WESLEY.

Two-edged sword. "This is no doubt intended to point out the judgments about to be pronounced by Christ against the rebellious Jews and the persecuting Romans; God's judgments were just now going to fall on both"—C. Trench notices that this description, sublime as a purely mental conception, would be intolerable if we were to give it an outward form. With the Greeks, æsthetical taste was the first consideration, to which all others must give way. With the Hebrews, truth and the full ideal representation of the religious reality was the paramount consideration, that representation being designed not to be outwardly embodied, but to remain a purely mental conception. This exalting of the essence above the form marks their deeper religious earnestness. (Ver. 20; ch. 2. 1; 3. 1; Isa. 49. 2; Eph. 6. 17; Hab. 4. 12; ch. 2. 12, 16; 19. 15, 21; Acts 26. 13; ch. 10. 1.)

17. And I fell at His feet as dead — "human nature not being able to sustain so glorious an appearance. Thus was he prepared (like Daniel of old, whom he peculiarly resembles) for receiving so weighty a prophecy. A great sinking of nature usually precedes a large communication of heavenly things. S. John, before our Lord suffered, was so intimate with Him, as to lean on His breast, to lie in His bosom. Yet now, near seventy years after, the aged apostle is by one glance struck to the ground. What a glory must this be! Ye sinners, be afraid; cleanse your hands; purify your hearts. Ye saints, be humble; prepare; rejoice. But rejoice unto Him with reverence—an increase of reverence towards this awful majesty can be no prejudice to your faith. Let all petulancy, with all vain curiosity, be far away, while you are thinking or reading of these things. And He laid His right hand upon me—the same wherein He held the seven stars. What did S. John then feel in himself? Saying, Fear not—His look terrifies, His speech strengthens. He does not call John by his name (as the angels did Zechariah and others), but speaks as his well-known Master. What follows is also spoken to strengthen and encourage him. I am. When in His state of humiliation He spoke of His glory, He frequently spoke in the third person, as Matt. 26. 64. But He now speaks of His own glory, without any veil, in plain and direct terms, The First and the Last—that is, the one eternal God, who is from everlasting to everlasting. (Isa. 41. 4)"—WESLEY.

Laid His right hand upon me. So the same Lord Jesus did at the Transfiguration to the three prostrate disciples, of whom S. John was one, saying, "Be not afraid." The touch of His hand, as of old, imparted strength. The First and the Last. In direct terms He claims one of the ancient titles, implying one of the incommunicable attributes of God. (Ezek. 1. 28; Dan. 8. 18; 10. 10; Isa. 41. 4; 44. 6; 48. 12; ch. 2. 18; 22. 13; ver. 11.)

18. And He that liveth—"another peculiar title of God. And I have the keys of death and of Hades—that is, the invisible world. In the intermediate state, the body abides in death, the soul in Hades. Christ hath the keys of, that is, the power over both; killing or quickening of the body, and disposing of the soul as it pleaseth Him. He gave S. Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven; but not the keys of death or of Hades. How comes, then, his supposed successor at Rome by the keys of purgatory?"—WESLEY.

I am the First and the Last, and the Living One, and I was dead (R.V.). The Living One. I have life in Myself, and am the source of it to My people. Keys of hell (Greek, "Hades"; Hebrew, "Sheol"). Hell as a place of torment is represented by entirely different words in both languages. "I can release from the unseen world of spirits, and from death whom I will." Keys are emblems of authority. "From the preceding description, mostly, are taken the titles given to Christ in the following letters, particularly the four first"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits the Amen in the middle of the verse. (Rom. 6. 9; ch. 4. 9; 5. 14; Ps. 68. 20; ch. 20. 1.)

19. Write the things which thou hast seen — "this day; which accordingly are written (ch. 1. 11–18). And which are — the instructions relating to the present state of the seven churches. These are written (ch. 1. 20; 3. 22). And which shall be hereafter—to the end of the world; written (ch. 4. 1, etc.)"—WESLEY.

"These visions and prophecies are for general instruction, and therefore every circumstance must be faithfully recorded. What he had seen was to be written; what he was about to see, relative to the seven churches, must be also written; and what he was to see afterwards, concerning other churches and states, must be recorded also"—C. (Ver. 12; ch. 2. 1; 4. 1.)

20. "Write first the mystery—the mysterious meaning of the seven stars. S. John knew, better than we do, in how many respects these stars were a popular emblem of those angels; how nearly they resembled each other, and how far they differed in magnitude, brightness, and other circumstances. The seven stars are angels of the seven churches — mentioned in ver. 11. In each church there was one pastor or ruling minister, to whom all the rest were subordinate. This pastor, bishop, or overseer, had the peculiar care over that flock; on him the prosperity of that congregation in a great measure depended, and he was to answer for all those souls at the judgment-seat of Christ. And the seven candlesticks are seven churches. How significant an emblem is this! for a candlestick, though of gold, has no light of itself; neither has any church, or child of man. But they receive from Christ the light of truth, holiness, comfort, that it may shine to all around them. As soon as this was spoken S. John wrote it down, even all that is contained in this first chapter. Afterwards what was contained in the second and third chapters was dictated to him in like manner"—WESLEY.

The mystery. "The use of this word in the New Testament is not very far removed from its primary meaning in classical Greek. We may paraphrase it, 'The hidden Divine truth now made known, but made known to God's favoured ones only.' (See Eph. 3. 3–12)"—C. B. The angels. "Not as some have imagined, the guardian angels of the churches, for how could heavenly angels be charged with the delinquencies laid here to the charge of these angels? The bishop, or superintendent pastor, the man responsible for the doctrine and discipline, must be the angel. And such a term is in full accordance with the enigmatic symbolism of this book; it is transferred from the heavenly to the earthly ministers of Jehovah, reminding them that, like the heavenly angels above, they should fulfil God's mission below, zealously, promptly, and efficiently"—P. (Ch. 16. 12; Mal. 2. 7; ch. 2. 1; Zech. 4. 2; Matt. 5. 15; Phil. 2. 15.)

CHAPTER II.

MESSAGES TO THE CHURCHES. — "Of the following letters to the angels of the seven churches it may be necessary to speak first in general, and then particularly. In general we may observe, when the Israelites were to receive the Law at Mount Sinai they were first to be purified; and, when the kingdom of God was at hand, John the Baptist prepared men for it by repentance. In like manner we are prepared by these letters for the worthy reception of this glorious revelation. By following the directions given herein, by expelling incorrigibly wicked men, and putting away all wickedness, those churches were prepared to receive this precious depositum. And whoever in any age would profitably read or hear it, must observe the same admonitions. These letters are a kind of sevenfold preface to the book. Christ now appears in the form of a man (not yet under the emblem of a lamb), and speaks mostly in proper, not in figurative, words. It is not till ch. 4. 1, that S. John enters upon that grand vision which takes up the residue of the book.

"There is in each of these letters—

> "1. A command to write to the angel of the church; 2. A glorious title of Christ; 3. An address to the angel of that church, containing a testimony of his mixed, or good, or bad state; an exhortation to repentance or steadfastness; a declaration of what will be: generally, of the Lord's coming: 4. A promise to him that overcometh, together with the exhortation, 'He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear.'

'The address in each letter is expressed in plain words; the promise, in figurative. In the address our Lord speaks to the angel of each church which then was, and to the members thereof directly; whereas in the promise He speaks of all that should overcome, in whatever church or age, and deals out to them one of the precious promises (by way of anticipation) from the last chapters of the book"—WESLEY.

Vers. 1-7. EPHESUS.—1. Write—"so Christ dictated to him every word. These things saith He who holdeth the seven stars in His right hand—such is His mighty power! such His favour to them and care over them, that they may indeed shine as stars, both by purity of doctrine and holiness of life! Who walketh—according to His promise, 'I am with you always, even to the end of the world'—in the midst of the golden candlesticks—beholding all their works and thoughts, and ready to 'remove the candlestick out of its place,' if any, being warned, will not repent. Perhaps here is likewise an allusion to the office of the priests in dressing the lamps, which was to keep them always burning before the Lord"—WESLEY.

"Ephesus being the chief city, and, to some extent, the mother church of the district, the Lord addresses the church there in the character of Lord of all the churches, holding the seven stars"—C. B. Walking expresses His unwearied activity in the Church, guarding her from external and internal evils, as the high priest moved to and fro in the sanctuary. (Ch. 1. 16; 20. 13.)

2. I know—"Jesus knows all the good and all the evil which His servants and His enemies suffer and do. Weighty word, 'I know,' how dreadful will it one day sound to the wicked, how sweet to the righteous! The churches and their angels must have been astonished, to find their several states so exactly described, even in the absence of the apostle, and could not but acknowledge the all-seeing eye of Christ and of His Spirit. With regard to us, to every one of us also He saith, 'I know thy works.' Happy is he that conceives less good of himself than Christ knows concerning him. And thy labour. After the general, three particulars are named, and then more largely described in an inverted order:—

> "1. Thy labour; 2. Thy patience; 3. Thou canst not bear evil men; 4. Thou hast tried those who say they are apostles and are not, and hast found them liars; 5. Thou hast patience; 6. Thou hast borne for My name's sake, and hast not fainted.

"And thy patience—notwithstanding which thou canst not bear that incorrigibly wicked men should remain in the flock of Christ. And thou hast tried those who say they are apostles, and are not—for the Lord hath not sent them"—WESLEY.

Tried them which say they are apostles. (Comp. 2 Cor. 11. 13.) The church at Ephesus had been warned of this danger (Acts 20. 28–30), and had remembered it. Canst not bear them that are evil. We are to bear one another's burdens in the case of "weak" brethren (Gal. 6. 2), but not to bear "false" brethren's. It is said that S. John would not remain under the same roof with Cerinthus the heretic. (Ps. 1. 6; vers. 9, 13, 19; ch. 3. 1, 8, 15; 1 John 4. 1; 2 Cor. 11. 13; 2 Pet. 2. 1.)

3. And thou hast patience and didst bear for My name's sake, and hast not grown weary. Thou hast borne My reproach, though thou canst not bear the evil (ver. 2). The antithesis should be noted. (Gal. 6. 9; Heb. 12. 3, 5.)

4. But I have against thee, that thou hast left thy first love—"that love for which all that church was so eminent when S. Paul wrote his Epistle to them. He need not have left this. He might have retained it entire to the end. And he did retain it in part, or there could not have remained so much of what was commendable in him. But he had not kept, as he might have done, the first tender love in its vigour and warmth. Reader, hast thou?"—WESLEY.

"Some have understood the word of love to the brethren, because we have 'the first works' in the next verse; but the argument is a bad one. Of course those good works, whether of charity in the narrower sense of the word or not, proceeded from love to Christ"—C. B. How characteristic of our gracious Lord, that He puts foremost all He can find to approve, and only after this notes the shortcomings. I have this against thee (R.V.). It was not a trifling defect, as the "somewhat" of the A.V. would appear to imply.

5. "It is not possible for any to recover the first love, but by taking these three steps—(1) Remember; (2) Repent; (3) Do the first works. Remember from whence thou art fallen—from what degree of faith, love, holiness, though perhaps insensibly. And repent—which in the very lowest sense implies a deep and lively conviction of thy fall. Of the seven angels, two, at Ephesus and at Pergamos, were in a mixed state; two, at Sardis and at Laodicea, were greatly corrupted; all these are exhorted to repent, as are the followers of Jezebel at Thyatira; two, at Smyrna and Philadelphia, were in a flourishing state, and are therefore only exhorted to steadfastness. There can be no state, either of any pastor, church, or single person, which has not here suitable instructions. All, whether ministers or hearers, together with their secret or open enemies, in all places and all ages, may draw hence necessary self-knowledge, reproof, commendation, warning, or confirmation. Whether any be as dead as the angel at Sardis, or as much alive as the angel at Philadelphia, this book is sent to him, and the Lord Jesus hath something to say to him therein. For the seven churches with their angels represent the whole Christian Church, dispersed throughout the whole world, as it subsists, not, as some have imagined, in one age after another, but in every age. This is a point of deep importance, and always necessary to be remembered: that these seven churches are, as it were, a sample of the whole Church of Christ, as it was then, as it is now, and as it will be in all ages. Do the first works—outwardly and inwardly, or thou canst never regain the first love. But if not—by this word is the warning sharpened to those five churches which are called to repent; for if Ephesus was threatened, how much more shall Sardis and Laodicea be afraid! And according as they obey the call or not, there is a promise or a threatening. (Ch. 2. 5, 16, 22; 3. 3, 20.) But even in the threatening the promise is implied, in case of true repentance. I come to thee, and will remove thy candlestick out of its place—I will remove, unless thou repent, the flock now under thy care to another place, where they shall be better taken care of. But from the flourishing state of the church of Ephesus after this, there is reason to believe he did repent"—WESLEY.

Repent. "Neither this word, nor the cognate word repentance, is used in S. John's Gospel or Epistles. Do the first works. This is like an echo of John the Baptist's teaching; these works are 'works meet for repentance.' He does not say, 'Feel the first feelings'; but He says, Do the first works, for that is in thy power. Do again what love made thee do, and so learn to love again. Remove thy candlestick. I will take away the gospel light from Ephesus, and remove it elsewhere. It is removal of the candlestick, not extinction of the candle, judgment for some, but that very judgment the occasion of mercy for others. So it has been. The seat of the Church has been changed, but the Church itself survives. What the East has lost, the West has gained. One who lately visited Ephesus found only three Christians there, and those so ignorant as scarcely to have heard the names of S. Paul or S. John"—TRENCH. (Matt. 21. 41, 43.)

6. But thou hast this—"Divine grace seeks whatever may help him that is fallen to recover his standing—that thou hatest the works of the Nicolaitanes—probably so called from Nicolas, one of the seven deacons. (Acts 6. 5.) Their doctrines and lives were equally corrupt. They allowed the most abominable lewdness and adulteries, as well as sacrificing to idols; all which they placed among things indifferent, and pleaded for as branches of Christian liberty"—WESLEY.

Nicolaitanes. "Michaelis' view is probable. Nicolaus (conqueror of the people) is the Greek version of Balaam. The Book of Revelation abounds in such duplicate Hebrew and Greek names, as Apollyon, Abaddon; Devil, Satan; Yea, Amen. The name, like other names, Egypt, Babylon, Sodom, is emblematic. See vers. 14, 15, for the character of the Nicolaitanes; they were not an outside sect, but professing Christians, who, like Balaam of old, tried to introduce into the Church a false freedom, a reaction in the opposite direction from Judaism. They abused S. Paul's doctrine of the grace of God into a plea for lasciviousness"—P. (See 2 Pet. 2. 15, 16, 19, and Jude 4, 11, where the same sort of seducers are described followers of Balaam.) Hatest the deeds. We may "hate the sin with all our heart, but still the sinner love." (Ver. 15.)

7. He that hath an ear, let him hear. "Every man, whoever can hear at all, ought carefully to hear this. What the Spirit saith—in these great and precious promises—to the churches—and in them to everyone that overcometh; that goeth on from faith, and by faith to full victory over the world, and the flesh, and the devil. In these seven letters twelve promises are contained, which are an extract of all the promises of God. Some of them are not expressly mentioned again in this book, as 'the hidden manna,' the inscription of 'the name of the new Jerusalem,' the 'sitting upon the throne.' Some resemble what is afterwards mentioned, as 'the hidden name' (ch. 14. 12); 'the ruling the nations' (ch. 19. 15); 'the morning star' (ch. 22. 16). And some are expressly mentioned, as 'the tree of life' (ch. 22. 2); freedom from 'the second death' (ch. 20. 6); the name in 'the book of life' (ch. 20. 12; 21. 27); the remaining 'in the Temple of God' (ch. 7. 15); the inscription of 'the name of God and of the Lamb' (ch. 14. 1; 22. 4). In these promises sometimes the enjoyment of the highest goods, sometimes deliverance from the greatest evils, is mentioned. And each implies the other, so that where either part is expressed, the whole is to be understood. That part is expressed which has most resemblance to the virtues or works of him that was spoken to in the letter preceding. To eat of the tree of life. The first thing promised in these letters is the last and highest in the accomplishment. (Ch. 22. 2, 14, 19.) 'The tree of life' and 'the water of life' go together (ch. 22. 1, 2); both implying the living with God eternally. In the paradise of My God. The word 'paradise' means a garden of pleasure. In the earthly paradise there was one tree of life; there are no other trees in the paradise of God"—WESLEY.

What the Spirit saith. "What Christ saith, the Spirit saith—unto the churches—not to Ephesus only, but to the universal Church. Eat of the tree of life. The thing promised corresponds to the kind of faithfulness exhibited. They who refrained from Nicolaitane indulgences and from idol-meats (vers. 14, 15) shall eat of the tree of life, and the hidden manna"—P. (Matt. 11. 15; 13. 9, 43; vers. 11, 17, 29; ch. 3. 6, 13, 22; 13. 9; 22. 2, 14; Gen. 2. 9.)

Vers. 8–12. SMYRNA.—8. These things saith the First and the Last, who was dead and is alive. "How directly does this description tend to confirm him against the fear of death! (vers. 10, 11). Even with the comfort wherewith S. John himself was comforted (ch. 1. 17, 18), shall the angel of this church be comforted"—WESLEY.

The attributes ascribed to Christ are especially appropriate to the message to Smyrna, which was a promise of the crown of life to the faithful unto death. (Ch. 1. 8, 17, 18.)

9. I know thy affliction and poverty—"a poor prerogative in the eyes of the world! The angel at Philadelphia likewise had in their sight but 'a little strength.' And yet these two were the most honourable of all in the eyes of the Lord. But thou art rich—in faith and love, of more value than all the kingdoms of the earth. Who say they are Jews—God's own people. And are not—they are not Jews inwardly, not circumcised in heart. But a synagogue of Satan—who, like them, was a liar and a murderer from the beginning"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits thy works. Tribulation—owing to persecution. Poverty—owing to the spoiling of their goods. But thou art rich. Contrast Laodicea, "rich" in the world's eyes and her own, poor before God. "There are rich poor-men, and poor rich-men, in God's sight"—TRENCH. Synagogue of Satan. The Jews, who might have been the Church of God, had now by their opposition and unbelief, become the "synagogue of Satan." (Ver. 2; Luke 12. 21; 1 Tim. 6. 18; Jas. 2. 5; Rom. 2. 17, 18, 29; 9. 6; ch. 3. 9.)

10. "The first and last words of this verse are particularly directed to the minister; whence we may gather that his suffering and the affliction of the Church were at the same time, and of the same continuance. Fear none of those things which thou art about to suffer—probably by means of the false Jews. Behold—this intimates the nearness of the affliction. Perhaps the ten days began on the very day that the Revelation was read at Smyrna, or at least very soon after. The devil—who sets all persecutors to work, and these more particularly—is about to cast some of you—Christians at Smyrna, where in the first ages the blood of many martyrs was shed—into prison, that ye may be tried—to your unspeakable advantage. (1 Pet. 4. 12, 14.) And ye shall have affliction—either in your own persons, or by sympathising with your brethren. Ten days—(literally taken) in the end of Domitian's persecution, which was stopped by the edict of the Emperor Nerva. Be thou faithful. Our Lord does not say, 'till I come,' as in the other letters, but unto death—signifying that the angel of this church should quickly after seal his testimony with his blood; fifty years before the martyrdom of Polycarp, for whom some have mistaken him. And I will give thee the crown of life—the peculiar reward of them who are 'faithful unto death'"—WESLEY.

"Polycarp, bishop of the church at Smyrna, suffered death by martyrdom, A.D. 155, when he was a very aged man. Whether it is possible that he was the person to whom this verse was addressed, depends upon the date assigned to the book, or rather to the vision which the book records. The question is more curious than important. Ten days. The numbers of the Apocalypse which refer to future times represent certain ideas, and not precise qualities"—WORDSWORTH. Hence the ten days denote a considerable but limited time. Many have applied it to the ten years of Domitian's persecution. (Matt. 10. 22; 24. 13; Jas. 1. 12; ch. 3. 11.)

11. The second death—"the lake of fire, the portion of the fearful, who do not overcome. (Ch. 21. 8)"—WESLEY.

The second death. "The phrase is peculiar to the Apocalypse. It seems that they who die that death shall be hurt by it, whereas if it were annihilation, and so a conclusion of their torments, it would be no way hurtful, but highly beneficial to them"—BISHOP PEARSON. "What matter about that first death, which must soon or late pass over us, if we escape the second death? Polycarp's noble words to the heathen judges who wished him to recant are well known, 'Fourscore and six years have I served the Lord, and He never wronged me; how then can I blaspheme my King and Saviour?'"—P. (Ver. 7; ch. 13. 9; 20. 14; 21. 8.)

Vers. 12-17. PERGAMOS.—12. The sword—"with which I will cut off the impenitent (ver. 16)"—WESLEY.

The reference is to ch. 1. 16; the description is again appropriate to the nature of the message.

13. Where the throne of Satan is. "Pergamos was above measure given to idolatry; so Satan had his throne and full residence there. Thou holdest fast My name—openly and resolutely confessing Me before men. Even in the days wherein Antipas—martyred under Domitian—was My faithful witness. Happy is he to whom Jesus, the faithful and true Witness, giveth such a testimony!"—WESLEY.

Satan's throne (R.V.). "Why Satan's throne was localised at Pergamum is uncertain. Two explanations have been given—that it was a seat of the worship of Æsculapius, whose image held a serpent; and since recent excavations it has been suggested that the phrase referred to the great altar of Zeus Soter, which Attalus set up to commemorate his victory over the Gauls. More probably the meaning is only, that Pergamum was in a special sense a home of the Satanic spirit of persecution. Antipas. It is more than doubtful whether anything authentic is known of Antipas except from this passage. My witness, My faithful one (R.V.). The word, in Greek, 'martyr,' was already used in its technical sense"—C. B. (Vers. 2, 9.)

14. But thou hast there—"whom thou oughtest to have immediately cast out from the flock—them that hold the doctrine of Balaam—doctrine nearly resembling his—who taught Balak—and the rest of the Moabites—to cast a stumblingblock before the sons of Israel. They are generally termed 'the children,' but here 'the sons of Israel,' in opposition to the 'daughters' of Moab, by whom Balaam enticed them to fornication and idolatry. To eat things sacrificed to idols—which, in so idolatrous a city as Pergamos, was in the highest degree hurtful to Christianity. And to commit fornication—which was constantly joined with the idol-worship of the heathens"—WESLEY.

Eat things sacrificed to idols—"the act charged upon the Israelites (Num. 25. 2) as well as upon the Nicolaitanes in S. John's days. The temptation to eat idol-meats was a peculiarly strong one to the Gentile converts; for not to do so involved almost a withdrawal from partaking of any social meal with the heathen around. For idol-meats, after a part had been offered in sacrifice, were nearly sure to be on the heathen entertainer's table. Hence arose the decree of the Council at Jerusalem forbidding to eat such meats; subsequently some at Corinth ate unscrupulously and knowingly of such meats, on the ground that the idol is nothing; others needlessly tortured themselves with scruples, lest unknowingly they should eat of them, when they got meat from the market, or in a heathen friend's house. S. Paul handles the question, 1 Cor. (ch. 8. and ch. 10. 14–33")—P. (Num. 24. 14; 25. 1; 31. 16; 2 Pet. 2. 15; Jude 11; ver. 20; Acts 15. 29; 1 Cor. 6. 13; 8. 9, 10; 10. 19, 20.)

15. In like manner thou also—"as well as the angel at Ephesus—hast them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes—and thou sufferest them to remain in the flock"—WESLEY.

So hast thou also some that hold the teaching of the Nicolaitanes in like manner (R.V.)—omitting which I hate. "This correction makes it certain that we are not to suppose two immoral sects at Pergamum, but one sect, holding the doctrine taught by Balaam of old and the Nicolaitanes now. The sense is, 'Thou hast with thee followers of Balaam; he taught God's people to fornicate and to communicate in idol-worship, and the Nicolaitanes with thee teach the same'"—C. B. (Ver. 6.)

16. If not, I come to thee—"who wilt not wholly escape when I punish them—and will fight with them—not with the Nicolaitanes, who are mentioned only by the by, but the followers of Balaam. With the sword of My mouth—with My just and fierce displeasure. Balaam himself was first withstood by the angel of the Lord with 'his sword drawn' (Num. 22. 23), and afterwards 'slain with the sword' (Num. 31. 8)"—WESLEY.

"The angel of the church is bidden to repent. The whole church, and especially its bishop, is more or less guilty for having extended to the Nicolaitanes the toleration which the church at Ephesus was praised for refusing"—C. B. Fight with them—with the Nicolaitanes, or followers of Balaam primarily, but including also the chastisement of the whole church. (Isa. 11. 4; 2 Thess. 2. 8; ch. 1. 16; 19. 15, 21.)

17. To him that overcometh—"and eateth not of those sacrifices—will I give of the hidden manna—described in John 6. The new name answers to this: it is now 'hid with Christ in God.' The Jewish manna was kept in the ancient ark of the covenant. The heavenly ark of the covenant appears under the trumpet of the seventh angel (ch. 11. 19), where also the hidden manna is mentioned again. It seems probably to mean the full, glorious, everlasting fruition of God. And I will give him a white stone. The ancients, on many occasions, gave their votes in judgment by small stones; by black, they condemned; by white ones they acquitted. Sometimes also they wrote on small smooth stones. Here may be an allusion to both. And a new name. So Jacob, after his victory, gained the new name of Israel. Wouldest thou know what thy new name will be? The way to this is plain—overcome. Till then all thy inquiries are vain. Thou wilt then read it on the white stone"—WESLEY.

Hidden manna. "Christ Himself is the Manna, hidden from the world, but revealed to the believer, so that he has already a foretaste of His preciousness. The full manifestation shall be at His coming"—P. White stone and new name—"evidently closely connected. The white stone is a gift in itself, not merely a vehicle of the new name. The stone and the name are the separate possession of each to whom they are given. Most likely both are a token entitling the bearer to some further benefit. The Greeks had feasts to which every feaster brought a token as a pledge that he would pay his share of the cost. Such a token might also prove his right to join the company. If so, it may be meant that when they who are worthy are called to the Marriage Supper, each is called by the new name which he only knows, and as each hears and answers, the white stone with the new name is his passport at the door"—C. B. Ellicott's Commentary, with Clarke and others, compares the white stone with the Roman tessera hospitalis, the token of friendship, and with the tokens admitting to the Temple feasts. He also reminds us that the gift of a new name is not uncommon in Scripture, and that it appears always to imply a step taken into a higher life. It will be remembered that Christ Himself speaks of His new name (ch. 3. 12), which is perhaps that spoken of (ch. 19. 12), "which no man knew but He Himself." On the other hand, Trench suggests, the white stone is a glistering diamond, the Urim (lights) borne by the high priest within the breastplate of judgment, next the heart. None but the high priest knew the name written upon it, probably the incommunicable name of God. Believers, as spiritual priests to God, shall enjoy the heavenly antitypes to the hidden manna and the Urim stone. As Phinehas was rewarded with an everlasting priesthood for his zeal against the sin to which the Old Testament Balaam seduced Israel, so the heavenly priesthood is the reward promised here to those who overcome the New Testament Balaamites, tempting Christ's people to the same sin. (Vers. 7, 11; ch. 3. 12; 19. 12.)

Vers. 18–29. THYATIRA.—18. And to the angel of the church at Thyatira—"where the faithful were but a little flock—these things saith the Son of God. See how great He is, who appeared 'like a son of man'! (Ch. 1. 13.) Who hath eyes as a flame of fire—'searching the reins and the heart' (ver. 23). And feet like fine brass—denoting His immense strength. Job comprises both these, His wisdom to discern whatever is amiss, and His power to avenge it, in one sentence (Job 42. 2), 'No thought is hidden from Him, and He can do all things'"—WESLEY.

Again the attributes of the Speaker agree with the address. The title "Son of God" is from Ps. 2. 7, 9, which is referred to in ver. 27. (Ch. 1. 14, 15.)

19. I know thy love. "How different a character is this from that of the angel of the church at Ephesus! The latter could not bear the wicked, and hated the works of the Nicolaitanes, but had left his first love and first works. The former retained his first love, and had more and more works, but did bear the wicked, did not withstand them with becoming vehemence. Mixed characters both; yet the latter, not the former, is reproved for his fall, and commanded to repent. And faith, and thy service, and patience. Love is shown, exercised, and improved by serving God and our neighbour; so is faith by patience and good works"—WESLEY.

And that thy last works are more than the first—in contrast with Ephesus (ver. 4). "Thyatira was just the reverse of Ephesus. There, much zeal for orthodoxy, but little love; here, activity of faith and love, but insufficient zeal for godly discipline and doctrine, a patience (suffering) of error, even where there was not a participation in it"—TRENCH. (Ver. 2.)

20. But thou sufferest that woman Jezebel—"who ought not to teach at all (1 Tim. 2. 12)—to teach and seduce My servants. At Pergamos were many followers of Balaam; at Thyatira, one grand deceiver. Many of the ancients have delivered, that this was the wife of the pastor himself. Jezebel of old led the people of God to open idolatry. This Jezebel, fitly called by her name, from the resemblance between their works, led them to partake in the idolatry of the heathens. This she seems to have done by first enticing them to fornication, just as Balaam did; whereas at Pergamos they were first enticed to idolatry, and afterwards to fornication"—WESLEY.

"Jezebel, with her strong will, seduced the weak Ahab and his people beyond the calf-worship (which was the worship of the true God under the cherub-ox form, i.e. a violation of the second commandment), to that of Baal and Ashtaroth (a violation of the first). Impurity was part of the worship of the Phœnician Astarte. Hence we read of the 'whoredoms' of Jezebel (2 Kings 9. 22). Her spiritual counterpart at Thyatira lured God's servants by utterances of pretended inspiration to libertinism, fornication, and the eating of idol-meats. By a false spiritualism these seducers led their victims into the grossest carnality, as though things done in the flesh were outside the true man, and were, therefore, indifferent"—P. (1 Kings 16. 31; 21. 25; 2 Kings 9. 7; Ex. 34. 15; Acts 15. 20, 29; ver. 14.)

21. And I gave her time to repent—"so great is the power of Christ! But she will not repent. So, though repentance is the gift of God, man may refuse it; God will not compel"—WESLEY.

22. "I will cast her into a bed—into great affliction—and them that commit either carnal or spiritual adultery with her, unless they repent—she had her time before—of her works—those to which she had enticed them, and which she had committed with them. It is observable, the angel of the church at Thyatira was only blamed for suffering her. This fault ceased when God took vengeance on her. Therefore he is not expressly exhorted to repent, though it is implied"—WESLEY.

"There is evidently a transition from literal to spiritual fornication. The idea arose from Jehovah's relation to the Old Testament Church being regarded as a marriage, any transgression against which was fornication or adultery. With her—implies participation with her in her adulteries, viz. by suffering her (ver. 20), or letting her alone, and so virtually encouraging her. Her punishment is distinct from theirs; she is to be cast into a bed (perhaps of sickness and anguish), and her children to be killed; while those who make themselves partakers of her sin by tolerating her, are to be cast into great tribulation"—P. (Rom. 2. 4; ch. 9. 20.)

23. And I will kill her children—"those which she hath borne in adultery, and them whom she hath seduced—with death. This expression denotes death by the plague, or by some manifest stroke of God's hand. Probably the remarkable vengeance taken on her children was the token of the certainty of all the rest. And all the churches—to which thou now writest—shall know that I search the reins—the desires—and hearts—thoughts"—WESLEY.

Her children—"her proper adherents; not those who suffer her, but those who are begotten of her. A distinct class from the last, whose sin was only that of connivance. I am He—the 'I' is strongly emphatical. Searcheth the reins. The word searcheth expresses an accurate following up of all tracks and windings. God's peculiar attribute is given to Christ"—P. (1 Sam. 16. 7; 1 Chron. 28. 9; 29. 17; 2 Chron. 6. 30; Ps. 7. 9; Jer. 11. 20; 17. 10; 20. 12; John 2. 24, 25; Acts 1. 24; Rom. 8. 27; Ps. 62. 12; Matt. 16, 27; Rom. 2. 6; 14. 12; 2 Cor. 5. 10; Gal. 6. 5; ch. 20. 12.)

24. But I say to you who do not hold this doctrine—"of Jezebel—who have not known the depths of Satan. O happy ignorance! As they speak—that were continually boasting of the deep things which they taught. Our Lord owns they were deep, even deep as hell; for they were the very 'depths of Satan.' I will lay upon you no other burden—than that you have already suffered from Jezebel and her adherents"—WESLEY.

"The heretics condemned were doubtless a sect of those who called themselves Gnostics, probably at this time, certainly in the next generation. They contrasted their knowledge of the depths or 'deep things of God' with the faith of the orthodox in the plain, simple doctrines that were openly preached to the world; the Lord answers, that the depths of knowledge that they attained were depths, not of God, but of Satan. None other burden—namely, than abstinence from fornication and things offered to idols. (Acts 15. 28.) Yet it is a question whether we may not understand the sentence thus: 'I will lay on you no other burden than to hold fast that ye have till I come'"—C. B.

25. What ye—"both the angel and the Church—have"—WESLEY.

"What ye have received through My gospel, as essential to true religion—hold fast—in principle and practice, in faith, love, and obedience, till I come, to bring to an end your time of trial, and to receive you to the heavenly paradise"—B. (Ch. 3. 11.)

26. My works—"those which I have commanded—to him will I give power over the nations—that is, I will give him to share with Me in that glorious victory which the Father hath promised Me over all the nations who as yet resist Me. (Ps. 2. 8, 9)"—WESLEY.

My works in contrast to "her works" (ver. 22.) A.V. power (R.V. "authority"). (John 6. 29; 1 John 3. 23; Matt. 19. 28; Luke 22. 29, 30; 1 Cor. 6. 3; ch. 3. 21; 20. 4.)

27. And he shall rule them—"that is, shall share with Me when I do this—with a rod of iron—with irresistible power, employed on those only who will not otherwise submit; who will hereby be dashed in pieces—totally conquered"—WESLEY.

"This appears to be intended of that final triumph of Christ over His enemies in the last day, when He shall crush them to utter and irrevocable ruin, and when all His saints, raised from the dead, and clothed with robes of glory, shall sit down with Him on His throne"—B. Vessels of a potter . . . broken to shivers—"because of their failing to answer the design of their Maker; the image to depict God's irresistible sovereign power to give reprobates to destruction, not by caprice, but in the exercise of righteous judgment"—P. As I received. Ps. 2. 9 is assumed to be the promise of the Father to the Son; as is plain from ver. 8. (Ps. 2. 8, 9; 49. 14; Dan. 7. 22; ch. 12. 5; 19. 15.)

28. I will give him the morning star. "Thou, O Jesus, art the Morning Star! Oh give Thyself to me! Then will I desire no sun, only Thee, who art the sun also. He whom this star enlightens has always morning and no evening. The duties and promises here answer each other; the valiant conqueror has power over the stubborn nations. And he that, after having conquered his enemies, keeps the works of Christ to the end, shall have the morning star—an unspeakable brightness and peaceable dominion in him"—WESLEY.

"I will give him Myself, who am the Morning Star. (Comp. ver. 17, 'I will give him the hidden manna,' that is Myself, who am that manna). (John 6. 31)"—P. "The pledge of the coming day, both for the waiting witnesses and for the ungodly"—ELLICOTT. (2 Pet. 1. 19; ch. 22. 16.)

CHAPTER III.

Vers. 1–8. MESSAGES TO THE CHURCHES, continued—SARDIS.—1. The seven Spirits of God—"the Holy Spirit from whom alone all spiritual life and strength proceed. And the seven stars—which are subordinate to Him. Thou hast a name that thou livest—a fair reputation, a goodly outside appearance. But that Spirit seeth through all things, and every empty appearance vanishes before Him"—WESLEY.

"This Epistle being sent to a languishing ministry and church, they are very fitly reminded that Christ has the seven Spirits, the Spirit without measure and in perfection, to whom they may apply themselves for the reviving of His work among them"—M. H. In the other Epistles Christ begins with commending what was good in the churches, and then proceeds to tell them what was amiss; in this, and in the Epistle to Laodicea, He begins with severe reproof. (Ch. 1. 4, 16; 4. 5; 5. 6; 2. 2; Eph. 2. 1, 5; 1 Tim. 5. 6.)

2. The things which remain—"in thy soul; knowledge of the truth, good desires, and convictions—which were ready to die—wherever pride, indolence, or levity revives, all the fruits of the Spirit are 'ready to die'"—WESLEY.

I have not found thy works perfect before God (R.V. "no works of thine fulfilled")—"weighed in the balance of Him who requires living faith as the motive, and found wanting. Before God. Christ's judgment is God's judgment. In the sight of men, Sardis had a name that she lived"—P. "So many and so great are the obligations of pastors, that he who would in reality fulfil even a third of them, would be esteemed holy by men, whereas, if content with that alone, he would be sure not to escape hell"—D'AVILA.

3. Remember how—"humbly, zealously, seriously—thou didst receive the grace of God once, and hear—His word—and hold fast—the grace thou hast received. And repent—according to the word thou hast heard"—WESLEY.

Thou hast received, and didst hear (R.V.). The meaning is that the doctrine of the gospel has been committed to them, and they have it still. They are exhorted to hold it fast (R.V. 'keep it'), and repent. As a thief. "Twice in the days of His flesh Christ spake the same words (see references), and so deeply had they impressed the apostles that they are often repeated in their writings. The Greek proverb was that 'the feet of the avenging deities are shod with wool,' expressing the noiseless approach of the Divine judgments"—P. (1 Tim. 6. 20; 2 Tim. 1. 13; vers. 11, 19; Matt. 24. 42, 43; 25. 13; Mark 13. 33; Luke 12. 39, 40; 1 Thess. 5. 2, 6; 2 Pet. 3. 10; ch. 16. 15.)

4. Yet thou hast a few names—"that is, persons. But though few, they had not separated themselves from the rest; otherwise, the angel of Sardis would not have had them. Yet it was no virtue of his, that they were unspotted; whereas it was his fault that they were but few. Who have not defiled their garments—either by spotting themselves, or by partaking of other men's sins. They shall walk with Me in white—in joy; in perfect holiness; in glory. They are worthy. A few good among many bad are doubly acceptable to God. Oh how much happier is this worthiness than that mentioned in Rev. 16. 6!"—WESLEY.

Names. "Some understand from the similar use of the word in Acts 1. 15, that it was usual for every church to keep a register of its members. It is possible indeed that the names are spoken of as entered in the book of life (see next verse); but the use of that image would be more forcible, if the readers of the Revelation were familiar with an approximate counterpart on earth"—C. B. Walk in white. The reward accords with the character of the rewarder; keeping their garments undefiled through the blood of the Lamb, they shall walk with Him in white hereafter. "Walk" implies spiritual life and liberty. With Me. So Jesus promised the dying thief; for this He prayed for all His people. This was the hope of S. Paul, to be with Christ. (Acts 1. 15; Jude 23; ch. 4. 4; 6. 11; 7. 9, 13.)

5. He shall be clothed in white raiment—"the colour of victory, joy, and triumph—and I will not blot his name out of the book of life—like that of the angel of the church at Sardis: but he shall live for ever. I will confess his name—as one of My faithful servants and soldiers"—WESLEY.

Shall thus be arrayed (R.V.). He that overcometh is to have the same reward as those who have not defiled their garments. C. B., however, suggests that the allusion may be to the priestly robe which the speaker wore, Thus as I am now. Blot his name. Then the book of life is not an eternal and unchangeable document. "There is a process of erasure going on, besides that of entering; when the soul has finally taken its choice for evil; when the defilement of sin has become inveterate and indelible, then the pen is drawn through the name, the inverted stylus smears the wax over the unworthy characters, and when the owner of that name applies afterwards for admission, the answer must be, I know thee not"—ELLICOTT. I will confess his name. "Compare, with the same promise made when Christ was on earth, Matt. 10. 32, 33; Luke 12. 8, 9. He omits 'in heaven' after My Father, now that He is Himself in heaven. These undesigned coincidences prove that these Epistles are, as they profess, Christ's own addresses, not even tinged with the colour of S. John's style, as it appears in his Gospel and Epistles. The coincidence is not with John's own Gospel, so much as with the other three. So the clause, 'He that hath an ear' is not repeated from S. John, but from all three Synoptics"—P. (Ch. 19. 8; Ex. 32. 32; Ps. 69. 28; Phil. 4. 3; ch. 13. 8; 17. 8; 20. 12; 21. 27; Matt. 10. 32; Luke 12. 8.)

Vers. 7–13. PHILADELPHIA.—7. "The holy One . . . the true One—two great and glorious names. He that hath the key of David—a master of a family, or a prince, has one or more keys, wherewith he can open and shut all the doors of his house or palace. So had David a key, a token of right and sovereignty, which was afterwards adjudged to Eliakim. (Isa. 22. 22.) Much more has Christ, the Son of David, the key of the spiritual city of David, the New Jerusalem; the supreme right, power, and authority, as in His own house. He openeth this to all that overcome, and none shutteth: He 'shutteth' it against all the fearful, and none openeth. Likewise when He openeth a door on earth for His works or His servants, none can shut; and when He shutteth against whatever would hurt or defile, none can open"—WESLEY.

"The power of the keys, intrusted even to apostles, gave them no right to alter the essentials of the gospel, or the fundamental principles of morality. Absolution given by any of them could only be conditional, unless the giver possess the infallible discerning of spirits"—ELLICOTT. Evidently the Redeemer claims this power here, being about to exercise it, as supreme Head of the Church, in defence of the faithful in Philadelphia. (Acts 3. 14; 1 John 5. 20; ver. 14; ch. 1. 5; 6. 10; 19. 11; Isa. 22. 22; Luke 1. 32; ch. 1. 18; Matt. 16. 19; Job 12. 14.)

8. I have given before thee an opened door—"to enter into the joy of thy Lord; and meantime to go on unhindered in every good work. Thou hast a little strength—but little outward human strength; a little, poor, mean, despicable company. Yet thou hast kept My word—both in judgment and practice"—WESLEY.

An open door—"through which thou mayest enter into the kingdom, into the house of David, and no man can shut it. Probably the false Jews mentioned in the next verse denied the title of the Christians in Philadelphia to the privileges of brotherhood"—C. B. "Christ is to be acknowledged as the author of all the liberty and opportunity His churches enjoy, and He takes notice, and keeps account, how long He has preserved their spiritual liberties and privileges for them"—M. H. (Ver. 1; 1 Cor. 16. 9; 2 Cor. 2. 12.)

9. Behold, I—"who have all power; and they must then comply—I will make them come and bow down before thy feet—pay thee the lowest homage. And know—at length, that all depends on My love, and that thou hast a place therein. Oh, how often does the judgment of the people turn quite round, when the Lord looketh upon them! (Job 42. 7, etc.)"—WESLEY.

I give of the synagogue of Satan (R.V.). "That is, some of them. The promise to Philadelphia is larger than that to Smyrna. To Smyrna the promise was that the synagogue of Satan should not prevail against the faithful in her; to Philadelphia, that she should even win over some of the 'synagogue of Satan' to fall on their faces, and confess God is in her of a truth. Their worshipping before her feet expresses the converts' willingness to take the lowest place in the Church, doing servile honour to those whom once they persecuted, rather than dwell with the ungodly"—P. (Ch. 2. 9; Isa. 49. 23; 60. 14.)

10. Because thou hast kept the word of My patience. "The word of Christ is indeed a 'word of patience.' I also will keep thee—Oh happy exemption from that spreading calamity!—from the hour of temptation—so that thou shalt not enter into temptation; but it shall pass over thee. 'The hour' denotes the short time of its continuance; that is, at any one place. At every one it was very sharp, though short; wherein the great tempter was not idle. (Ch. 2. 10.) Which hour shall come upon the whole earth—the whole Roman empire. It went over the Christians, and over the Jews and heathens; though in a very different manner. This was the time of the persecution under the seemingly virtuous Emperor Trajan. The two preceding persecutions were under those monsters, Nero and Domitian; but Trajan was so admired for his goodness, and his persecution was of such a nature, that it was a temptation indeed, and did thoroughly try them that dwelt upon the earth"—WESLEY.

The word of My patience—"the word which inculcates and communicates patience; or equivalent to the 'word of promise,' of promise concerning Me, the gospel testimony to things invisible and future in Christ, which are the subject of the believer's patient expectation and hope"—W. W. (2 Pet. 2. 9; Luke 2. 1; Isa. 24. 17.)

11. I come quickly—"to put an end to those trials which for the present are so painful"—B. "A potential rather than a personal advent"—W. W. Thy crown—"which is ready for thee, if thou endure to the end"—WESLEY. (Phil. 4. 5; ch. 1. 3; 22. 7, 12, 20; ver. 3; ch. 2. 10, 25.)

12. I will make him a pillar in the temple of My God—"I will fix him as beautiful, as useful, and as immovable as a pillar in the Church of God. And he shall go out no more—but shall be holy and happy for ever. And I will write upon him the name of My God—so that the nature and image of God shall appear visibly upon him. And the name of the city of My God—giving him a title to dwell in the New Jerusalem. And My new name—a share in that joy which I entered into, after overcoming all My enemies"—WESLEY.

"In a sense there shall be 'no temple' in the heavenly city, for all things and persons shall be holy unto the Lord. The city shall be all one temple, in which the saints shall not merely be stones, as in the spiritual temple now on earth, but eminent as pillars"—P. Go no more out. "Who would not yearn for that city out of which no friend departs, and into which no enemy enters?"—S. AUGUSTINE. The name of

My God—as belonging to God in a peculiar sense, and therefore secure. (Ch. 7. 3; 9. 4; 14. 1; 22. 4.) The name of the city of My God—as one of its citizens—alluded to here by anticipation, described more fully in the closing chapters. This was the city that Abraham looked for. My new name—as wholly belonging to Christ. The "new name" of Christ intimates His assuming a new character and position as the Conqueror and King. (1 Kings 7. 21; Gal. 2. 9; ch. 2. 17; 14. 1; 22. 4; Gal. 4. 26; Heb. 12. 22; ch. 21. 2, 10; 22. 4.)

Vers. 14-22. LAODICEA.—14. To the angel of the church at Laodicea—"for these S. Paul had had a great concern. (Col. 2. 1.) These things saith the Amen—that is, the True One, the God of Truth. The Beginning—the Author, Prince, and Ruler. Of the creation of God—of all creatures; 'the Beginning,' or Author, by whom God made them all"—WESLEY.

The Amen. "The title happily harmonises with the address. His unchanging faithfulness contrasts with Laodicea's wavering of purpose. Faithful — trustworthy — true — not simply 'truth-speaking'—the Greek word means real, genuine, 'perfectly realising all that is comprehended in the name witness.' Three things are necessary for this—(1) To have seen with his own eyes what he attests; (2) To be competent to relate it to others; (3) To be willing truthfully to do so. In Christ all these conditions meet"—TRENCH. The Beginning of the creation—"as in Col. 1. 15, the Beginning of all creation"—P. (Isa. 65. 16; ch. 1. 5; 19. 11; 22. 6; ver. 7; Col. 1. 15.)

15. I know thy works—"thy disposition and behaviour, though thou knowest it not thyself—that thou art neither cold—an utter stranger to the things of God, having no care or thought about them—nor hot—as boiling water; so ought we to be penetrated and heated by the fire of love. O that thou wert. This wish of our Lord plainly implies that He does not work on us irresistibly, as the fire does on the water which it heats. Cold or hot—even if thou wert 'cold,' without any thought or profession of religion, there would be more hope of thy recovery"—WESLEY.

"The lukewarm state is desirable, if it be transitional to a warmer; for a little religion, if real, is better than none at all; but it is most fatal when, as here, it is an abiding condition, for it is mistaken for a safe state"—P. "Best described as those who take an interest in religion, but the worship of the idol of good taste or good form leads them to regard enthusiasm as ill-bred; who have never put themselves to any inconvenience, braved any reproach, or abandoned any comfort for Christ's sake; but hoped to keep well with the world, while they flattered themselves they stood well with God. Compare the exhortation to Archippus of Laodicea, calling him to greater ministerial earnestness. (Col. 4. 17)"—ELLICOTT. (Ver. 1.)

16. So because thou art lukewarm. "The effect of lukewarm water is well known. I am about to spue thee out of My mouth—I will utterly cast thee from Me; that is, unless thou repent"—WESLEY.

"The image is intended to be an offensive one, interfering with the self-satisfied refinement to which it is addressed"—C. B.

17. Because thou sayest. "Therefore 'I counsel thee,' etc. I am rich—in gifts and grace, as well as worldly goods—and knowest not that thou art—in God's account, wretched and pitiable"—WESLEY.

(Comp. Hos. 12. 8.) "It is not necessary to interpret the words either of material wealth, or of fancied spiritual wealth, to the exclusion of the other. S. James (ch. 2. 1-6) shows that in the first century, as in the nineteenth, the respectable classes found it easiest to be religious, to their own satisfaction"—C. B. "Observe what a difference there was between the thoughts they had of themselves, and those Christ had of them"—M'K. (Hos. 12. 8; 1 Cor. 4. 8.)

18. I counsel thee—"who art poor, and blind, and naked—to buy of Me—without money or price—gold purified in the fire—true, living faith, which is purified in the furnace of affliction—and white raiment—true holiness—and eyesalve—spiritual illumination; the 'unction of the Holy One,' which teacheth all things"—WESLEY.

"Gentle and loving irony. 'Take My advice, thou who fanciest thyself in need of nothing. Buy of Me. Buy at the cost of thine own self-sufficiency (Phil. 3. 7, 8), and the giving up of all things, however dear, that would prevent us receiving Christ's grace as a free gift. Gold tried in the fire — faith tested by fiery trials—white raiment. Laodicea's wools were famous, but Christ offers whiter raiment, even the righteousness of saints. Eyesalve. The eye is here the conscience, or inner light of the mind. The Holy Spirit's unction, like the ancient eyesalves, first smarts with conviction of sin, then heals. Trench notices that the most sunken churches of the seven, viz. Sardis and Laodicea, are the ones in which alone are specified no opponents from without, or heresies from within. The Church owes much to God's overruling providence, which has so often made both external and internal foes, in spite of themselves, to promote His cause, by calling forth the energies of His people in contending for the faith"—P. (Isa. 55. 1; Matt. 13. 44; 25. 9; 2 Cor. 5. 3; ch. 7. 13; 16. 15; 19. 8.)

19. Whomsoever I love—"even thee, thou poor Laodicean! Oh how much has His unwearied love to do!—I rebuke—for what is past—and chasten—that they may amend for the time to come"—WESLEY.

This is the encouragement to Laodicea not to despair, but to regard the rebuke as a token for good, if she profit by it. Be zealous—the opposite of "lukewarm"—only thus can that church obey the command to repent. (Job 5. 17; Prov. 3. 11, 12; Heb. 12. 5, 6; Jas. 1. 12.)

20. I stand at the door, and knock—"even at this instant; while He is speaking this word. If any man open—willingly receive Me—I will sup with him—refreshing him with My graces and gifts, and delighting myself in what I have given. And he with Me—in life everlasting"—WESLEY.

If any man hear My voice. "Man is not compelled by irresistible force; Christ knocks, but does not break open the door; whoever does hear, does so not of himself, but by the drawings of God's grace; but He draws, not drags"—P. I will sup with him. "He will accept of what is good in them; He will eat His pleasant fruit, and He will bring the best part of the entertainment with Him; if what He finds would make but a poor feast, what He brings will make up the deficiency; He will give fresh supplies of graces and comforts, and thereby stir up fresh actings of faith and love and delight; and in all this Christ and His repenting people will enjoy pleasant communion with each other"—M. H. (Cant. 5. 2; Luke 12. 37; John 14. 23.)

21. I will give him to sit with Me on My throne—"in unspeakable happiness and glory. Elsewhere, heaven itself is termed the throne of God: but this throne is in heaven"—WESLEY.

"'The highest place is within reach of the lowest; the faintest spark of grace may be fanned into the mightiest flame of love.' The same whom Christ had threatened to spue out of His mouth is now offered a seat with Him on His throne. The antithesis with Me and with My Father, and of My throne and His throne, points out a distinction between the glory which the saved shall share with Christ, and that in which He is united to the Father. Even as I overcame. This imports—(1) The greatness of the glory; they shall partake, according to their capacity, of the heavenly glory of the Son of Man; (2) The certainty of it; (3) The method of its attainment"—W. W. TRENCH notices: "The order of the promises in the seven epistles corresponds to that of the unfolding of the kingdom of God from its first beginnings on earth to its consummation in heaven. To the faithful at Ephesus—(1) 'The tree of life in the paradise of God' is promised, answering to Gen. 2; (2) Sin entered the world, and death by sin; but to the faithful at Smyrna it is promised, 'they shall not be hurt by the second death'; (3) The promise to Pergamos of the 'hidden manna' brings us to the Mosaic period, the Church in the wilderness; (4) That to Thyatira, 'triumph over the nations,' forms the consummation of the kingdom in prophetic type, the period of David and Solomon characterised by this power over the nations. Here there is a division, the seven falling into two groups, four and three; and the scenery of the last three passes from earth to heaven; (5) Christ promises to the believer at Sardis 'not to blot out his name from the Book of Life, but to confess him before His Father and the angels at the judgment'; (6) To the faithful at Philadelphia He promises that they shall be 'citizens of the New Jerusalem, fixed as immovable pillars there'; not only individual salvation, as in the case of Sardis, but the blessed communion of the Church triumphant; (7) Lastly, to the faithful of Laodicea is given the crowning promise, not only the two former blessings, but 'a seat with Christ on His throne.'" (Matt. 19. 28; Luke 22. 30; 1 Cor. 6. 2; 2 Tim. 2. 12; ch. 2. 26, 27.)

22. He that hath an ear, let him hear, etc. "This stands in the three former letters before the promise; in the four latter, after it; clearly dividing the seven into two parts; the first containing three, the last, four letters. The titles given our Lord in the three former letters peculiarly respect His power after His resurrection and ascension, particularly over His Church; those in the four latter, His Divine glory, and unity with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Again, this word being placed before the promises in the three former letters, excludes the false apostles at Ephesus, the false Jews at Smyrna, and the partakers with the heathens at Pergamos, from having any share therein. In the four latter, being placed after them, it leaves the promises immediately joined with Christ's address to the angel of the church, to show that the fulfilling of these was near; whereas the others reach beyond the end of the world. It should be observed, that the overcoming, or victory (to which alone these peculiar promises are annexed), is not the ordinary victory obtained by every believer, but a special victory over great and peculiar temptations by those that are strong in faith"—WESLEY.

CHAPTER IV.

THE VISION OF THE ETERNAL THRONE.—1. After these things. "As if he had said, After I had written these letters from the mouth of the Lord. By the particle and, the several parts of this prophecy are usually connected; by the expression, 'after these things,' they are distinguished from each other. (Ch. 7. 9; 19. 1.) By that expression, 'and after these things,' they are distinguished, and yet connected. (Ch. 7. 1; 15. 5; 18. 1.) S. John always saw and heard, and then immediately wrote down one part after another; and one part is constantly divided from another by some one of these expressions. I saw. Here begins the relation of the main vision, which is connected throughout; as it appears from 'the throne, and Him that sitteth thereon'; 'the Lamb' (who hitherto has appeared in the form of a man); 'the four living creatures'; and 'the four and twenty elders,' represented from this place to the end. A door opened in heaven—several of these openings are successively mentioned. Here 'a door is opened'; afterward, 'the temple of God in heaven' (ch. 11. 19; 15. 5); and, at last, 'heaven' itself. (Ch. 19. 11.) By each of these S. John gains a new and more extended prospect. And the first voice which I had heard—namely, that of Christ; afterward, he heard the voices of many others—said, Come up hither—not in body, but in spirit; which was immediately done"—WESLEY.

"Chaps. 4 and 5 set before us the heavenly scenery of the succeeding visions, and God on His throne, as the Covenant God of His Church, revealing them to the apostle through Jesus Christ. As the communication respecting the seven churches opened with a vision of the Lord Jesus as the Head of the Church, so this second part opens with a vision suitable to the matter to be revealed"—P. (Ch. 1. 10, 19; 11. 12; 22. 6.)

2. And immediately I was in the Spirit—"even in an higher degree than before. (Ch. 1. 10.) And, behold, a throne was set in heaven. S. John is to write 'things which shall be'; and, in order thereto, he is here shown, after an heavenly manner, how whatever 'shall be,' whether good or bad, flows out of invisible fountains; and how, after it is done on the visible theatre of the world and the Church, it flows back again into the invisible world, as its proper and final scope. And One sat on the throne—as a King, Governor, and Judge. Here is described God, the Almighty, the Father of heaven, in His majesty, glory, and dominion"—WESLEY.

"It is implied that he was caught up through the opened door into heaven, and saw what was going on above. Was set—was there already—not that he saw it put in its place"—C. B. One sat on the throne—"the great world-drama is to move forward under the eyes of the ruling One"—ELLICOTT. (Ch. 1. 10; 17. 3; 21. 10; Isa. 6. 1; Jer. 17. 12; Ezek. 1. 26; 10. 1; Dan. 7. 9.)

3. And He that sat was in appearance—"shone with a visible lustre, like that of sparkling precious stones, such as those which were of old on the high priest's breastplate, and those placed on the foundations of the New Jerusalem. (Ch. 21. 19, 20.) If there is anything emblematical in the colours of these stones, possibly the jasper, which is transparent and of a glittering white, with an intermixture of beautiful colours, may be a symbol of God's purity, with various other perfections, which shine in all His dispensations. The sardine stone, of a blood-red colour, may be an emblem of His justice, and the vengeance He was about to execute on His enemies. An emerald, being green, may betoken favour to the good; a rainbow, the everlasting covenant. (See Gen. 9. 9.) And this being round about the whole breadth of the throne, fixed the distance of those who stood or sat round it"—WESLEY.

"The rainbow was the appointed token of God's covenant with all flesh, and His people in particular. Hereby God in type renewed to man the grant originally made to the first Adam. The antitype will be the 'new heavens and new earth' restored to redeemed man, just as the earth, after destruction by the Flood, was restored to Noah"—P. (Ezek. 1. 28.)

4. And round about the throne—"in a circle, are four and twenty thrones, and on the thrones four and twenty elders—the most holy of all the former ages (Isa. 24. 23; Heb. 12. 1), representing the whole body of the saints. Sitting—in general; but falling down when they worship—clothed in white raiment. This and their golden crowns show, that they had already finished their course and taken their place among the citizens of heaven. They are never termed 'souls,' and hence it is probable that they had glorified bodies already. Comp. Matt. 27. 52)"—WESLEY.

R.V. also four and twenty thrones. "There are substantially two views as to the signification of these elders, both leading to the same result—(1) That they are the twelve patriarchs, the heads of the tribes of Israel, together with the twelve apostles, the heads of the new people of God; (2) That they answer to the heads of the twenty-four courses of the priests. (1 Chron. 24.) Either way of explaining their number points to the same explanation of their office; they are the glorified embodiment and representatives of the people of God"—C. B. The same view is taken, substantially, by many others. (Ch. 11. 16; 3. 4, 5; 6. 11; 7. 9, 13, 14; 19. 14; ver. 10.)

5. And out of the throne go forth lightnings—"which affect the sight. Voices—which affect the hearing. Thunderings—which cause the whole body to tremble. Weak men account all this terrible; but, to the inhabitants of heaven, it is a mere source of joy and pleasure, mixed with reverence to the Divine majesty. Even to the saints on earth these convey light and protection, but to their enemies terror and destruction"—WESLEY.

Comp. the giving of the Law on Sinai. (Ex. 19. 16.) Thunderings—expressing God's threat against the ungodly. Seven lamps . . . seven Spirits—the Holy Spirit in His sevenfold operation, as the light and life-giver, the purifier of the godly, and the consumer of the ungodly. (Matt. 3. 11; ch. 8. 5; 16. 18; Ex. 37. 23; 2 Chron. 4. 20; Ezek. 1. 13; Zech. 4. 2; ch. 1. 4; 3. 1; ver. 6.)

general, but clear as rock crystal. "The tabernacle of Israel was a 'pattern'; the holy place a figure of heaven itself. The throne was represented by the mercy-seat in the Holy of Holies, with the Shekinah cloud over it. The 'seven lamps of fire before the throne' are antitypical to the seven-branched candlestick; the sea of glass corresponds with the molten sea before the sanctuary; the four living creatures answer to the cherubim over the mercy-seat"—P. Sea of glass. "The woman in purple (ch. 17) sits on 'many waters,' the fickle and stormy sea of world-opinion, fashion, and passion, the unguided and unprincipled thoughts of men. The sea of glass represents the counsels of God, purposes of righteousness and love, which are often fathomless, but never obscure, and always the same, though sometimes (as ch. 15. 2) 'mingled with fire'"—ELLICOTT. Four beasts (R.V. "living creatures"). The "beasts" in ch. 13 are "wild beasts," altogether a different word. What these "living ones" are intended to represent, commentators are by no means agreed. The fathers in general explain them of the four Gospels. The lion, the emblem of courage, is thought to symbolise the earliest Gospel, which sets forth the kingly authority of Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah. The young ox, emblem of strength and endurance, represents S. Mark, who unfolds the minute details of our Lord's ministerial labours. The face of a man, indicating prudence and benevolence, is the symbol of S. Luke, whose Gospel embodies the richest manifestation of the compassion of Jesus. The flying eagle—penetration soaring beyond earthly things, clearness in discerning the deepest mysteries of Divine love, are characteristic of the Gospel according to S. John. It is needless to add that these interpretations are purely fanciful, although the four Evangelists are still sometimes represented by these symbols. Mr. WESLEY says: "These seem to be taken from the cherubim in the visions of Isaiah and Ezekiel, and in the holy of holies. They are doubtless some of the principal powers of heaven, but of what order it is not easy to determine. It is very probable that the twenty-four elders may represent the Jewish Church; their harps seem to intimate their having belonged to the ancient tabernacle service, where they were wont to be used. If so, the living creatures may represent the Christian Church. Their number is symbolic of universality; and the new song which they all sing (ch. 5. 9), could not possibly suit the Jewish without the Christian Church." On the other hand, Dr. CLARKE quotes from Shemoth Rabba, "There are four which have principality in this world; among intellectual creatures, man; among birds, the eagle; among cattle, the ox; and among wild beasts, the lion. Each of these has a kingdom, and a certain magnificence; and they are placed under the throne of glory (Ezek. 1. 10), to show that no creature is to exalt itself in this world, and that the kingdom of God is over all." From this Jewish interpretation of the meaning of the cherubim, he concludes, "These creatures may be considered as representatives of the whole creation." As a contrast we may present an interpretation we find in MATTHEW HENRY, and which is suggested by W. W.: "In the vision of Ezekiel each living creature had the four forms which were presented in S. John's vision separately. Hence may be derived some support for the opinion that they symbolise the gospel ministry, presenting four qualities or attributes of God-sent ministers—courage, laboriousness, sympathy, and activity, or perhaps heavenly-mindedness. This opinion is, however, chiefly recommended by the fact that they had a position nearer to the throne than the rest of the representatives of the redeemed, by their taking the lead in the offering of praise and thanksgiving, and also by their acting as heralds, inviting to the disclosures consequent upon the unsealing of the apocalyptic volume by the Lamb." On the whole, the editor leans to the interpretation of Dr. MILLIGAN in the Expositor's Bible: "Taking the living creatures together in all their parts, they are an emblem of man, associated on the one hand with material creation, on the other with the various tribes of animals by which it is inhabited, but all redeemed, transfigured, perfected, delivered from the bondage of corruption, and brought into 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God.' They have a still wider and more comprehensive meaning than the 'twenty-four elders,' the latter setting forth only the Church, the former all creation, glorified." (Ex. 38. 8; ch. 15. 2; Ezek. 1. 5; ver. 8.)

7, 8. And the first—"just such were the four cherubim in Ezekiel, who supported the moving throne of God; whereas each of those that overshadowed the mercy-seat in the Holy of Holies had all these four faces; whence a late great man supposes them to have been emblematic of the Trinity, and the incarnation of the Second Person. A flying eagle—that is, with wings expanded"—WESLEY.

Full of eyes. "The force of nature is no blind force; it is employed in the service of God's providence, and all over it is the stamp of supreme wisdom. Also, the force of nature is observant of God's will. Its myriad eyes are fixed on Him"—E. Having each one of them six wings, are full of eyes round about and within. "The statement of ver. 6, that 'they are full of eyes before and behind,' is extended to tell us that they are covered with eyes, not only on the parts ordinarily visible, but when they spread their wings (and the eagle at least was in the attitude of flight) it is seen that the inside of the wings, and the parts beneath it, are full of eyes also"—C. B.

Each of them hath six wings—"as had each of the seraphim in Isaiah's vision. 'Two covered his face,' in token of humility and reverence; 'two his feet,' perhaps in token of readiness and diligence for executing Divine commissions. Round about and within they are full of eyes. 'Round about'—to see everything which is farther off from the throne than they are themselves. 'And within'—on the inner part of the circle which they make with one another. First they look from the centre to the circumference, then from the circumference to the centre. And they rest not—oh happy unrest!—day and night—as we speak on earth (but there is no night in heaven)—and say, Holy, holy, holy, is the Three-One God. There are two words in the original, very different from each other, both which we translate 'holy.' The one means properly 'merciful,' but the other, which occurs here, implies much more. This holiness is the sum of all praise, which is given to the almighty Creator, for all that He does and reveals concerning Himself, till the new song brings with it new matter of glory. This word properly signifies 'separated,' both in Hebrew and other languages. And when God is termed holy, it denotes that excellence which is altogether peculiar to Himself; and the glory flowing from all His attributes conjoined, shining forth from all His works, and darkening all things besides itself, whereby He is, and eternally remains, in an incomprehensible manner separate and at a distance, not only from all that is impure, but likewise from all that is created. God is separate from all things. He is, and works from Himself, out of Himself, in Himself, through Himself, for Himself. Therefore, He is the First and the Last, the only One and the Eternal, living and happy, endless and unchangeable, almighty, omniscient, wise and true, just and faithful, gracious and merciful. Hence it is that 'holy' and 'holiness' mean the same as 'God' and 'Godhead'; and as we say of a king, 'His Majesty,' so the Scripture says of God, 'His HOLINESS.' (Heb. 12. 10.) The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of God. When God is spoken of, He is often named 'the Holy One,' and as God swears by His name, so He does also by His holiness; that is, by Himself. This holiness is often styled 'glory'; often His holiness and glory are celebrated together. (Lev. 10. 3; Isa. 6. 3.) For holiness is covered glory, and glory is uncovered holiness. The Scripture speaks abundantly of the holiness and glory of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. And hereby is the mystery of the Holy Trinity eminently confirmed. That is also termed 'holy' which is consecrated to Him, and for that end separated from other things; and so is that wherein we may be like God, or united to Him. In the hymn resembling this, recorded by Isaiah (ch. 6. 3) is added, 'The whole earth is full of His glory.' But this is deferred in the Revelation, till the glory of the Lord (His enemies being destroyed) fills the earth"—WESLEY. (Num. 2. 2; Ezek. 1. 10; 10. 4; Isa. 6. 2; ver. 6; Isa. 6. 3; ch. 1. 8; ch. 4.)

9, 10. And when the living creatures give glory—the elders fall down—"that is, as often as the living creatures give glory, immediately the elders fall down. The expression implies that they did so at the same instant, and that they both did this frequently"—WESLEY.

When the living creatures shall give . . . elders shall fall down (R.V.). The four living creatures take the lead of these four and twenty elders, both in this anthem and in the "new song" (ch. 5. 9). The future tenses faithfully rendered in R.V. probably imply that this description of praise shall be repeated onward to eternity. Cast their crowns. Alford compares the story told by Tacitus, how Tiridates laid down his crown before the image of Nero, as a token of homage for his kingdom. It is by no means certain, however, that the crowns of the elders are intended as royal crowns; they may be the crowns of conquerors, cast at His feet to acknowledge that their victory is due to Him. (Ch. 1. 18; 4.; 5. 8, 14; 15 7; ver. 9.)

11. Worthy art Thou to receive. "This He receives not only when He is thus praised, but also when He destroys His enemies and glorifies Himself anew. The glory, and the honour, and the power—answering the thrice-holy of the living creatures (ver. 9). For Thou hast created all things. Creation is the ground of all the works of God; therefore, for this, as well as for His other works, will He be praised to all eternity. And through Thy will they were—they began to be. It is to the free, gracious, and powerfully-working will of Him who cannot possibly need anything that all things owe their first existence. And are created—that is, continue in being ever since they were created"—WESLEY.

Worthy art Thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honour and the power: for Thou didst create all things, and because of Thy will they were, and were created (R.V.). "Here we have the praise of God the Creator by His creatures as such; in the next chapter we have the praise of the Redeemer"—C. B. "To God all creatures owe their origin. In Him they live and move and have their being. Because of His will they were—let the reading be considered and remembered; 'were,' not 'are'—because of His will they were in His idea from eternity; and when the appointed moment came they were created. Wherefore let them praise"—E. (Ch. 5. 12; Gen. 1. 1; Acts 17. 24; Eph. 3. 9; Col. 1. 16; ch. 10. 6.)

CHAPTER V.

THE LAMB COMMISSIONED TO OPEN THE PROPHETIC BOOK.—1. And I saw. "This is a continuation of the same vision—in the right hand—the emblem of His all-ruling power. He held it openly, in order to give it to him that was worthy. It is scarce needful to observe that there is not in heaven any real book of parchment or paper, or that Christ does not really stand there in the shape of a lion or a lamb. But there are in heaven Divine counsels and transactions answerable to these figurative expressions. A book written within and without—that is, no part of it blank, full of matter. Sealed with seven seals—according to the seven principal parts contained in it, one on the outside of each. The usual books of the ancients were not like ours, but were volumes or long pieces of parchment, rolled upon a long stick, as we frequently roll silks. Such was this represented, which was 'sealed with seven seals.' Not as if the apostle saw all the seals at once; for there were seven volumes wrapped up one within another, each of which was sealed; so that upon opening and unrolling the first, the second appeared to be sealed up till that was opened, and so on to the seventh"—WESLEY.

A book. "The book which unfolds the principles of God's government; in a wide sense, the book of salvation, the interpretation of life, contains and interprets human history"—E. "Most modern commentators generalise, and suppose that it is the book of God's counsels. Some insist on the fact that though the seals are all broken, 'no portion of the roll is unfolded, nor is anything read out of the book.' They suppose it to stand for the complete counsel of God, which will not become intelligible till it has all been fulfilled, and therefore not before the end of time"—C. B. Seven seals. "The number 'seven' (divided into 'four,' the world-wide number, and 'three' the Divine) abounds in Revelation, and signifies completeness"—P. (Ezek. 2. 9, 10; Isa. 29. 11; Dan 12. 4.)

2. And I saw a strong angel. "This proclamation to every creature was too great for a man to make, and yet not becoming the Lamb Himself. It was therefore made by an angel, and one of uncommon eminence"—WESLEY.

A strong angel. His voice penetrated through heaven and earth, and under the earth (Hades).

3. And none—"no creature; no, not Mary herself—in heaven, or in earth, neither under the earth—that is, none in the universe. For these are the three great regions into which the whole creation is divided. Was able to open the book—to declare the counsels of God—nor to look therein—so as to understand any part of it"—WESLEY.

"The word worthy implies moral fitness; it was not lack of intellectual capacity which hindered. The worthiness of Christ was established in conflict and temptation. To look thereon—which would have enabled him to read some portion of its contents, viz. as much as was written on the outer fold of the back of the roll"—C. B. (Ver. 13.)

4. And I wept much—"a weeping which sprang from greatness of mind. The tenderness of heart which he always had appeared more clearly now he was out of his own power. The Revelation was not written without tears; neither without tears will it be understood. How far are they from the temper of S. John, who inquire after anything rather than the contents of this book! yea, who applaud their own clemency if they excuse those that do inquire into them!"—WESLEY.

R.V. omits to read. S. John has been promised a revelation of "things which must be hereafter," and now he weeps because his expectation appears to be frustrated. He is a pattern for us to imitate, in a careful and devout study of the Revelation.

5. One of the elders. There has been a hopeless attempt to identify this elder. "Some think," says Mr. WESLEY, quoting Bengel, "it was Jacob, from whose prophecy the name of Lion is given him (Gen. 49. 9)." And some have thought it was the Evangelist Matthew, and have assigned a still more fanciful reason. It appears certain that "the elders" did not represent individuals, but the redeemed Church. M. HENRY suggests that "God can make His people to instruct their teachers, when He pleases." The Lion of the tribe of Judah—"the victorious Prince, who is, like a lion, able to tear all His enemies to pieces"—WESLEY.

It will not be forgotten that the lion was the standard emblem of the tribe, and to call Christ the Lion of Judah is to represent Him as the victorious King. The root of David—not merely "a sucker come up from David's ancient root" (as Alford limits it), but also including the idea of His being Himself, as God, the root and origin of David. Hath prevailed to open the book—"hath overcome all obstructions, and obtained the honour to disclose the Divine counsels"—WESLEY.

Christ's victory, in His atonement, has this consequence, that He can open the book. (Gen. 49. 9; Heb. 7. 14; Isa. 11. 1, 10; Rom. 15. 12; ch. 22. 16; ver. 1; ch. 6. 1.)

6. And I saw—"first, Christ in or on the midst of the throne; secondly, the four living creatures making the inner circle round Him; and, thirdly, the four and twenty elders making a larger circle round Him and them. Standing—He lieth no more; He no more falls on His face; the days of His weakness and mourning are ended. He is now in a posture of readiness to execute all His offices of Prophet, Priest, and King—as if He had been slain—doubtless with the prints of the wounds which He once received. And because 'He was slain,' He is worthy to open the book (ver. 9), to the joy of His own people, and the terror of His enemies. Having seven horns—as a king, the emblem of perfect strength—and seven eyes—the emblem of perfect knowledge and wisdom. By these He accomplishes what is contained in the book, namely, by His almighty and all-wise Spirit. To these seven horns and seven eyes answer the seven seals and the sevenfold song of praise (ver. 12). In Zechariah, likewise (ch. 3. 9; 4. 10), mention is made of 'the seven eyes of the Lord, which go forth over all the earth.' Which—both the horns and the eyes—are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth—for the effectual working of the Spirit of God goes through the whole creation; and that in the natural, as well as the spiritual, world. For could mere matter act or move? Could it gravitate or attract? Just as much as it can think or speak"—WESLEY.

"He had been told of a lion, and he beholds a lamb, nay, not only a lamb, the emblem of patience and of innocence, but, as we learn from the use of the word slaughtered (not merely 'slain,' as in both A.V. and R.V.), a lamb for sacrifice and that had been sacrificed. Nor can we doubt for a moment, when we call to mind the Gospel of S. John and its many points of analogy with the Apocalypse, what particular lamb it was. It was the Paschal Lamb, the Lamb beheld in our Lord by John the Baptist, when he said, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' and again beheld by John the Evangelist on the cross, when in the fact that the soldiers brake not the legs of Jesus he traced the fulfilment of the Scripture, 'A bone of Him shall not be broken.' This, therefore, was the true Lamb, 'that taketh away the sin of the world,' the Lamb that gives us His flesh to eat, so that in Him we may have eternal life"—E. Which are the seven Spirits. "For the seven eyes see Zech. 4. 10. The seven lamps of ch. 4. 5 represent the Spirit as eternally proceeding from the Father, and belonging to the Father; these represent Him as proceeding from the Son and belonging to Him"—C. B. (Isa. 53. 7; John 1. 29, 36; 1 Pet. 1. 19; ch. 13. 8; vers. 9, 12; Zech. 3. 9; 4. 10; ch. 4. 5.)

7. And He came. "Here was 'Ask of Me' (Ps. 2. 8), fulfilled in the most glorious manner. And took. It is one state of exaltation that reaches from our Lord's ascension to His coming in glory. Yet this state admits of various degrees. At His ascension, 'angels and principalities and powers were subjected to Him.' Ten days after, He received from the Father and sent the Holy Ghost. And now He took the book out of the right hand of Him that sat upon the throne—who gave it Him as a signal of His delivering to Him all power in heaven and earth. He received it, in token of His being both able and willing to fulfil all that was written therein"—WESLEY.

"The Lamb takes it from the Father in token of formal investiture with His universal dominion as Son of Man. This introductory vision presents to us in summary the consummation to which all the events in the seals, trumpets, and vials converge, viz. the setting up of Christ's kingdom. Prophecy ever hurries on to the grand crisis or end, and dwells in intermediate events only in their typical relation to, and representation of, the end"—P. (Ch. 4. 2.)

8. And when He took the book, the four living creatures fell down. "Now is homage done to the Lamb by every creature. These, together with the elders, make the beginning; and afterward (ver. 14), the conclusion. They are together surrounded with a multitude of angels (ver. 11), and together sing the new song, as they had before praised God together (ch. 4. 8), etc. Having every one—the elders, not the living creatures—an harp—which was one of the chief instruments used for thanksgiving in the Temple service, a fit emblem of the melody of their hearts. And golden vials—cups or censers—full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints—not of the elders themselves, but of the other saints still upon earth, whose prayers were thus emblematically represented in heaven"—WESLEY.

Golden bowls full of incense (R.V.). "Here representing the acceptableness of the prayers of the saints through the intercession of Christ. These were offered by the living creatures and elders, as the prayers of Israel were offered while the priests were burning incense in the sanctuary. Of the saints—not presented by them as mediators, but as representatives of the actual offerers"—W. W. (Ch. 4. 8, 10; 14. 2; 15. 2; Ps. 141. 2; ch. 8. 3, 4.)

9. And they sing a new song—"one which neither they nor any other had sung before. Thou hast redeemed us—so the living creatures also were of the number redeemed. This does not so much refer to the act of redemption, which was long before, as to the fruit of it; and so more directly to those who had finished their course, 'who were redeemed from the earth' (ch. 14. 1) out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation—that is, out of all mankind"—WESLEY.

And didst purchase unto God with Thy blood men of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation (R.V.). Unto God. "Notice that the phrase is the exact reverse of some lax modern language upon the Atonement, which speaks as if the Son redeemed men from the Father. Out of every kindred—the first of many indications in this book of the catholicity of the Church; of course a complete refutation of the theories which ascribe to this Book a controversial anti-Pauline purpose, and a spirit of Jewish exclusiveness. There is really hardly anything in S. Paul so strong as this or ch. 7. 9"—C. B. R.V. "They sing a new song." It is their blessed occupation continually, and yet it is ever new. (Ps. 40. 3; ch. 14. 3; 4. 11; ver. 6; Acts 20. 28; Rom. 3. 24; 1 Cor. 6. 20; ch. 7. 23; Eph. 1. 7; Col. 1. 14; Heb. 9. 12; 1 Pet. 1. 18, 19; 2 Pet. 2. 1;

1 John 1. 7; ch. 14. 4; Dan. 4. 1; ch. 6. 25; 7. 9; 11. 9; 14. 6.)

10. And hast made them—"the redeemed. So they speak of themselves also in the third person, out of deep self-abasement. They shall reign over the earth—the new earth; herewith agree the golden crowns of the elders. The reign of the saints in general follows, under the trumpet of the seventh angel; particularly after the first resurrection, as also in eternity. (Ch. 11. 18; 15. 7; 20. 4; 22. 5; Dan. 7. 27; Ps. 49. 14)"—WESLEY.

And makest them to be unto our God a kingdom and priests; and they reign upon the earth (R.V.). A kingdom. (See note on ch. 1. 6.) They reign. Alford takes this reading and explains of the Church even now, in Christ her Head, reigning on the earth. Others argue that if the reading be correct it must be the prophetic present for the future; the seer being transported into the future when the full number of the redeemed shall be complete, and the visible kingdom begins. C. B. says the readings are about equal in authority, and that the R.V. must be preferred, as being more difficult to interpret. The future might be referred to the millennial reign (ch. 20. 4); but "if we adopt the present, it can hardly be used for a future." "Their cause would finally triumph on earth; the principles they espoused would prevail over all opposition. The infant Church here anticipates as her own such triumphs of the Redeemer's kingdom as are described in succeeding chapters"—W. W. "The Christian cause shall prevail through all ages, while those happy persons who have passed courageously through their trials on earth shall, at the appointed season, share the honours of Thy triumphant kingdom in the new heavens and earth"—B. (Ex. 19. 6; 1 Pet. 2. 5, 9; ch. 1. 6; 20. 6; 22. 5.)

11. And I saw—"the many angels—and heard—the voice and the number of them—round about the elders—so forming the third circle. It is remarkable that men are represented through this whole vision as nearer to God than any of the angels. And the number of them was—at least two hundred millions, and two millions over. And yet these were but a part of the holy angels. Afterward (ch. 7. 11) S. John heard them all"—WESLEY.

Lit. Myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands. (Comp. Dan. 7. 10.) "Their place is not so near the throne, so near the Lamb. 'For not unto angels did He subject the inhabited earth to come, whereof we speak.' He subjected it to man, to Him first of all who, having taken upon Him our human nature and in that nature conquered, was 'crowned with glory and honour,' but then also to the members of His body, who shall in due time reign over the earth. Yet angels rejoice with man, and, with creation redeemed and purified, their voices swell out into louder praise, while the manifold wisdom of God is made known 'to them in their heavenly places'"—E. (Ch. 4. 4, 6; Ps. 68. 17; Dan. 7. 10; Heb. 12. 22.)

12, 13. "We have in ver. 13 a kind of chorus, responsive to the new song sung by the elders. In ver. 12 seven principal perfections are mentioned as belonging to the Lamb; in ver. 13, four of them are again enumerated, and ascribed to the Lamb conjointly with Him that sitteth upon the throne. 'Such as the Father is, such is the Son.' Every creature—every order of being—under the earth—it seems harsh to understand the words of an unwilling co-operation of the devils in glorifying God and His Son. It is more possible to suppose the dead, even the holy dead, described as under the earth"—C. B. On the sea—those in ships, and marine animals. "All His works, in all places of His dominion."

And every creature—"in the whole universe, good or bad. In the heaven, on the earth, under the earth, on the sea—with these four regions of the world agrees the fourfold word of praise. What is 'in heaven' says blessing; what is 'on earth,' honour; what is 'under the earth,' glory; what is 'on the sea,' strength, is unto Him. This praise from all creatures begins before the opening of the first seal; but it continues from that time to eternity, according to the capacity of each. His enemies must acknowledge His 'glory'; but those in heaven say, Blessed be God and the Lamb. This royal manifesto is, as it were, a proclamation showing how Christ fulfils all things, and 'every knee bows to Him,' not only 'on earth,' but also 'in heaven, and under the earth.' This book exhausts all things (1 Cor. 15. 27, 28), and is suitable to a heart enlarged as the sand of the sea. It inspires the attentive and intelligent reader with such a magnanimity that he accounts nothing in this world great; no, not the whole frame of visible nature, compared to the immense greatness of what he is here called to behold, yea, and in part to inherit. S. John has in view, through the whole following vision, what he has been now describing, namely, the four living creatures, the elders, the angels, and all creatures, looking together at the opening of the seven seals"—WESLEY. (Ch. 4. 11; Phil. 2. 10; ver. 3; 1 Chron. 29. 11; Rom. 9. 5; ch. 16. 27; 1 Tim. 6. 16; 1 Pet. 4. 11; 5. 11; ch. 1. 6; 6. 16; 7. 10.)

14. And the four and twenty. We should read with R.V. simply, "And the elders fell down and worshipped." The brevity of the phrase, indicating their silent adoration, is far grander than the complete sentence in A.V. (Ch. 19. 4; 4. 9, 10.)

Only brief notes will be found on the chapters which follow. The interpretation of prophecy, it has been well said, is itself prophecy. The scope of this Commentary will not even allow an adequate representation of the various ways in which the predictions of this book have been, and still are, understood. It must suffice to give a general idea of the principles of interpretation adopted by many Christian students in the present day.

1. The object of the book is to cheer the Church, in the time of persecution and of conflict, with the assurance of the advent of the Lord; to warn her that there must be long years of trouble, and of conflict with gigantic powers of evil, that the patience and faith of the saints must be tested to the uttermost, but to assure her that nevertheless the Lord shall come, and every enemy shall fall before Him.

At the same time it is to be remembered that certain great culminating events in history are scripturally described as being "His coming." Such an event was the destruction of Jerusalem, and the overthrow of paganism in the Roman empire may have been another. Such partial fulfilments of prophecy have constantly anticipated its complete and final accomplishment.

2. The style of the book is symbolic, not with a Greek but with an Oriental symbolism. Much of its imagery comes direct from the prophetic writings of the Old Testament, but it has a symbolic language of its own also. The neglect of this fact, the treating of a symbolic expression as having only its literal and obvious meaning, has been the origin of many errors.

The object of the brief Notes which follow is simply to assist the devout student, not by presenting any system of interpretation, but by pointing out the origin of some of the imagery, and the spiritual lessons from time to time suggested.

CHAPTER VI.

THE OPENING OF SIX OF THE SEVEN SEALS OF THE BOOK.—1. Come and see (R.V. "Come"). "The words 'and see' are almost certainly spurious here, and in vers. 3, 5, 7"—C. B. Here begins the divergence of interpretation. Some have supposed the summons to be addressed to S. John, claiming his attention; some that it was "the cry of the redeemed creation to its Redeemer"; some that it is simply "a summons to the Horseman, who does in fact come." The general meaning of the vision of the seals is obvious. "Judgments are foretold as accompanying the preaching of the gospel to all nations. (Matt. 24. 6–14.) The opening of the first four seals is followed by judgments preparatory to His coming, and arranged in the same order as in S. Matthew, wars, famines, pestilences. At the opening of the fifth seal the martyrs above express their longing for the advent; at the sixth, the Lord's coming is ushered in with terrors to the ungodly; at the seventh (ch. 11. 15), the consummation is fully attained"—P.

2. White horse. "Not one of the four riders is a person. Each is rather a cause, a manifestation of certain truths connected with the kingdom of Christ, when that kingdom is seen to be, in its own nature, the judgment of the world. Even war, famine, death, and Hades, which follow, are not really these things. They are simply used, as scourges of mankind, to give general expression to the judgments of God. Thus, under the first rider, the cause rather than the person of Christ is introduced to us, in the earliest stage of its victorious progress, and with the promise of its future triumph"—E.

3. Red horse—symbol of war.

5, 6. Black horse—symbol of famine. A measure of wheat—ordinarily from twelve to sixteen measures were given for a denarius or penny. Hurt not the oil and the wine—spared for the refreshment of the sufferers, or symbolic of the comfort provided for the people of God amid the troubles of the world.

7, 8. A pale horse . . . Death and Hades—the personification of pestilence. (Comp. Ezek. 14. 21 with the four judgments here, the sword, famine, pestilence, and wild beasts.) "These four seals are marked off from the three last, by the four living creatures introducing them with the cry of 'Come.' They are not restricted to one time, but extend through the whole period of Church history to the coming of Christ"—P. The "historical" interpreters have seen the fulfilment of these four seals in Roman history, when Trajan carried imperial conquest to its utmost height, in the civil wars and mutinies during and after the age of the Severi, in the famines that followed, and in the general distress which made the barbarian conquest possible. Modern commentators recognise that these events may fairly be regarded as the first interpretation, but do not think the meaning of the symbols exhausted thereby.

9–11. The three last seals relate to the invisible world. "The scene changes from earth to heaven, so that interpretations which make the three last consecutive to the first four seals are very doubtful"—P. The souls of them that were slain. This passage need not be restricted to some particular martyrdoms, but receives fulfilment all along the course of the history of the Church. Avenge our blood. "It has been argued from this that the temper of the martyrs' souls is less than Christian. But no one can surely imagine that the spirit of this passage is a selfish desire for personal vengeance. As we meet with the germ of the thought in Ps. 94. 3, so we have a development of it, substantially identical with this, from the lips of the Master Himself. (Luke 17. 2–10.) Faith looks on evil with a hatred like God's own, shares God's will that it shall not triumph. Therefore, the Church on earth (the probable meaning of the widow in the parable), and the saints in heaven, cry alike to God to execute His own purpose, and bring the reign of evil to an end; and He does not yet, but He surely will"—E. White robes—indicative of purity, and joy, and victory. "Conscious bliss, as accepted and holy."

12-17. "As vers. 4, 6–8, the sword, famine, and pestilence, answer to Matt. 24. 6, 7, and vers. 9, 10, as to martyrdoms, answer to Matt. 24. 9, 10, so this passage answers to Matt. 24. 29, 30. The imagery describes the portents of the immediate coming of the day of the Lord, not the coming itself"—P. "The description is marked by almost unparalleled magnificence and sublimity. The real question is, To what does it apply? The destruction of Jerusalem, or the final judgment, or even every great calamity by which a sinful world is overtaken? In each of these senses, and in each with a certain degree of truth, has the passage been understood"—E. It will be remembered that language similar to that before us was employed by Joel (Joel 3. 30, 31), and was interpreted by S. Peter as finding a fulfilment in the founding of the Church on the day of Pentecost; that Malachi described the time of the Messiah's first coming as "the great and terrible day of the Lord." (Matt. 4. 5.) Many passages of similar character may be quoted from the Old Testament. (Isa. 2. 19; 13. 9, 10; 34. 2, 4; Hagg. 2. 6, 7.) "Whenever the Jew, animated by the spirit of the Old Testament, thought of the Judge of the earth as manifesting Himself in a greater than ordinary degree, in that truth and righteousness which are the glorious distinction of His character, he took advantage of such figures as we have before us. To the fall of Jerusalem, to the overthrow of idolatry in Rome, to every great crisis of human history, and to the close of all, they may be fittingly applied"—E. The wrath of the Lamb. It is hardly necessary to point out the terrible significance of the paradox. Who shall be able to stand? So Malachi asked, when he wrote of the first coming of Christ, and its issue in the judgment of the Jewish nation. (Mal. 3. 1.)

CHAPTER VII.

Vers. 1–8. Sealing of the Hundred and Forty-four Thousand.—1. The winds were emblems of days of trouble and of judgment. The tempests were restrained a while that S. John might see the security of the people of God. (Dan. 7. 2.)

2. The seal of the living God. "S. Paul tells us this seal has two legends (2 Tim. 2. 19): on the one side dependence upon God and union with Him, on the other side holiness of life"—Ellicott.

3. Sealed the servants of our God—"marked them out as such, and secured them from the impending calamities"—B.

4. An hundred and forty and four thousand. "We are to observe in the numbers of the Revelation a certain figurative proportion. As there were twelve patriarchs and twelve apostles, twelve became a sacred number in the synagogue and in the Christian Church. The number twelve, multiplied by itself, and then by one thousand, makes one hundred and forty-four thousand. This single passage may show the mistake of supposing the numbers in this book to be precise and exact; it cannot be intended that there should be in each tribe twelve thousand believers, neither more nor less, to make up the total sum. As the Church of Christ was first formed out of the Jewish Church and nation, the spiritual Israel is first mentioned. But the twelve tribes are not enumerated in the usual order. Judah has the precedence, because from him descended the Messiah, and in this tribe the kingdom was established. Dan is omitted, as it is in the Book of Chronicles in the recital of the posterity of the patriarchs. The Levitical ceremonies being abolished, Levi was again on a level with his brethren"—B. Opinions differ as to the meaning. Some modern commentators regard these as representing only Jewish believers; others, the entire Church of God. "The Christian Church absorbs the Jewish, inherits her privileges, and adopts her phraseology with a wider and nobler meaning. The twelve tribes were the appointed witnesses of pure theology and morals; the twelve apostles inherited a similar, though higher, spiritual work. The number twelve stands for a world-witness to Divine truth; the hundred and forty-four thousand represents the growth into full numbers. The omission of one tribe, and the changed name of another, are designed to show that in the Church as in Israel the most splendid opportunities may be lost"—Ellicott.

Vers. 9–17. The Innumerable Multitude.—9–12. A great multitude which no man could number. "The vision of a certain number of Israelites, and the next of an innumerable multitude of all nations, are certainly correlative to each other; and the most obvious way of understanding them is, that among God's elect there will be many faithful Israelites, and yet few compared to the number of faithful Gentiles. Others, however, regard the 'hundred and forty-four thousand,' and the 'innumerable multitude,' to represent the same persons, regarded in two different aspects. To God, they are all His own people, all duly numbered and marshalled and organised as His army, and every one known to Him by name; on the other hand, from a human point of view, they belong to all nations, and are too many to be counted"—C. B. Palms in their hands—"tokens of joy and victory"—Wesley.

More recent commentators suggest that the imagery is taken from the feast of tabernacles, the most joyous festival of the Jewish year. Amen. The blessing. "Before the Lamb began to open the seven seals, a sevenfold hymn of praise was brought Him by many angels. (Ch. 5. 12.)

Now He is upon opening the seventh seal, and the seven angels are going to receive seven trumpets, in order to make the kingdoms of the world subject to God. All the angels give sevenfold praise to God"—WESLEY.

13–17. Answered—namely, to S. John's thoughts, asked the question which might have been expected to arise in his mind. Great tribulation (R.V. "Which come out of the great tribulation"). The "historic" interpreters refer this to the persecution under the Pagan emperors; but it doubtless includes also all the tribulation which the saints of all ages have had to pass through. Washed their robes . . . the blood of the Lamb. "The language is in perfect accordance with the doctrine of the atonement by the death of Christ as a sacrifice, and is inexplicable in any other way. The idea of garments being washed in blood, and becoming white by such a process, could never have entered the mind apart from the efficacy of that atonement to cleanse the soul from sin"—W. W. (Isa. 1. 18; Heb. 9. 14; 1 John 1. 7; ch. 1. 5; see Zech. 3. 3–5.)

15. Shall dwell among them (R.V. "Shall spread His tabernacle over them—the Lamb shall be their Shepherd"). "(1) They are happy in their station, for they are before the throne of God night and day; (2) They are happy in their employment, for they serve God continually; (3) They are happy in their freedom from the inconveniences of this present life—want and pain; (4) They are happy in the love and conduct of the Lord Jesus; (5) They are happy in being delivered from all sorrow, or occasion of it"—M. H. The language is from the Old Testament. It has been maintained that this entire chapter refers to the Church on earth, describing its absolute security and happiness in the midst of the judgments coming on the world. Probably the old interpretation will hold its ground, which refers it to the heavenly rest and reward. (Isa. 4. 5, 6; 21. 3; 49. 10; Ps. 23. 1; 36. 8; John 10. 11, 14; Isa. 25. 8.)

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SEVENTH SEAL—THE FIRST FOUR TRUMPETS.—1. Silence in heaven—"implying the solemn introduction to the eternal Sabbatism which is to follow the seventh seal, and on the other hand the silence which continued during the incense-accompanied prayers which usher in the first of the seven trumpets. In the Jewish temple, during the offering of incense, solemn silence was kept. It implies, too, the adoring expectation with which the blessed spirits and the angels await the unfolding of God's judgments"—P.

3. Another angel—"a created angel. Such are all that are here spoken of. In this part of the Revelation, Christ is never termed 'an angel,' but 'the Lamb.' Much incense was given. Incense generally signifies prayer; here it signifies the longing desire of the angels, that the holy counsel of God might be fulfilled. And there was 'much incense,' for as the prayers of all the saints in heaven and earth are here joined together, so are the desires of all the angels which are brought by this angel. That he might place it—it is not said, 'offer it'; for he was discharging the office of an angel, not a priest. With the prayers of all the saints—at the same time; but not for the saints. The angels are fellow-servants with the saints, not mediators for them"—WESLEY.

There was given unto him much incense, that he should add it unto the prayers of all the saints (R.V.). "Thus disappears the supposed theological necessity of identifying this angel with the Lord Jesus; the prayers of all saints are presented by Him and no one else (ch. 5. 8, 9); but here the angels offer their own worship, as it is 'given to them,' in union, perhaps in subordination, to that of the redeemed"—C. B.

5. Cast it to the earth. "The meaning must be, to represent the same instrument as obtaining God's mercy on His people, and executing vengeance on His enemies"—C. B. Voices and thunderings—emblems of the breaking forth of the Divine wrath.

7–13. "The common feature of the first four trumpets is, that the judgments under them affect natural objects; the last three, the woe-trumpets, affect men's life with pain, death, and hell. The language is evidently drawn from the plagues of Egypt, five or six out of the ten exactly corresponding"—P. The third part of trees—"desolation extensive yet partial. This proportion runs through all the visions of the first six trumpets, indicating more widely extended troubles than those under the fourth seal, where the extent is 'over the fourth part of the earth'"—W. W. There fell a great star from heaven. Some have thought some false teacher, such as Arius, to be pointed out. Wormwood. Contrast the converse change of bitter water into sweet. (Ex. 15. 23.) Men died of the waters. Alford gives as an illustration in a physical point of view, the conversion of water into fire-water or ardent spirits, of which certainly many men have died. An angel flying through the midst of heaven (R.V. "An eagle flying in mid-heaven"). Woe, woe, woe. We see by ch. 9. 12; 11. 14, that three distinct woes are meant, one for each of the three trumpets.

CHAPTER IX.

Vers. 1–12. FIFTH TRUMPET—FIRST WOE.—1. I saw a star fall (R.V. "A star from heaven fallen to the earth"). The bottomless pit (R.V. "The pit of the abyss"). "We have here one of those contrasts of S. John a due attention to which is of such importance to the interpreter. This fallen star is the counterpart of Him who is 'the bright and morning star,' and who has 'the keys of Death and of Hades'"—E.

2–12. The army of locusts, described in terms evidently suggested by the description of the Egyptian plague in Ex. 10. 12, 15, and by the prediction of Joel 2. 3–10, has been variously interpreted. In ver. 4 we find that, whatever the plague is, it cannot hurt God's children. "It has characteristics partly human, partly diabolical, partly civilised, partly barbarous; the historic interpreters have seen the Saracens under Mahomet, whose religion was essentially a military system; others are inclined to refer them to the hordes of Goths whose unkempt locks and savage ferocity resemble this locust host. There are good grounds for taking the vision to prefigure a fierce invading army. But these may themselves be types of future scourges"—ELLICOTT. Five months. "It has been conjectured that this period is named, as being the time for which a plague of the literal locusts is likely to last"—C. B. A king over them—whereas "the locusts have no king." (Prov. 30. 27.) "It may signify the royalty assumed by the Mohammedan caliphs; but it is better to understand by this personage Satan, as the genius of destruction, bodily and spiritual"—W. W. For Abaddon see Job 26. 6 (R.V.). "A decided majority of orthodox commentators understand this vision as foretelling the Mahometan conquests, some taking the 'fallen star' of ver. 1 for Mahomet himself. Perhaps the Mahometan conquest is to be regarded as at least a partial fulfilment of this prophecy, but the attempts to show that it is in every detail an exact fulfilment have not been very successful"—C. B.

Vers. 13–21. SIXTH TRUMPET—SECOND WOE. —13. Voice from the four horns of the golden altar. Taken in connection with previous visions, this voice shows that the judgments continue to be the answer of the Almighty to His people's prayers.

14. At the river Euphrates—"the river whereat Babylon, the ancient foe of God's people, was situated. Once again, four angel ministers of God's vengeance shall go forth, four, to show that a world-wide judgment is intended, and assemble an army of horsemen to slay the third part of men"—P. Prepared for an hour (R.V. "for the hour")—for the definite time when this judgment should take place.

16. Two hundred thousand thousand. "The hosts here, from their numbers and their appearance, do not represent merely human hosts. To the Israelite the horse presented an object of terror rather than admiration, and an army of horsemen awakened the deepest feelings of alarm. (See Hab. 1. 5–10.) Like the locusts of the previous vision, the horses now spoken of are clothed with preternatural attributes, but the explanation is the same. Ordinary horses could not convey images of sufficient terror"—E.

20. And the rest of the men repented not—like Pharaoh hardening his heart, in spite of all the plagues. That they should not worship devils. Repentance demands amendment of life. Doubtless they were terrified, but they did not repent. "Some explain this vision of horsemen with breastplates of fire, jacinth, and brimstone (R.V. 'as of fire, hyacinth, and brimstone'), as referring to the myriads of the Turkish cavalry, clothed in red, blue, and yellow; and in the fire, smoke, and brimstone which proceeded out of their mouths some see a reference to the newly-invented artillery used in the siege and capture of Constantinople, A.D. 1453. In that case the judgment would come chiefly on the professed Christians of the Eastern and Greek Churches. Others have inferred, from vers. 20, 21, that the sins of the heathen are especially meant. The whole passage bears a more obvious and natural interpretation as referring to the world at large, than to the nominally Christian portion of it alone. And, so understood, it will mean that the present visitation left idolatry and moral corruption still prevalent in the world"—E.

CHAPTER X.

THE ANGEL WITH THE LITTLE BOOK.—"We are not told yet, as we might expect, that the second woe is past, nor does the seventh trumpet and the third woe immediately follow; but, just as in ch. 7, the two descriptions of the sealed Israelites and the palm-bearing multitude come after the sixth seal, so here the vision of the mighty angel, and the prophecy (passing insensibly into a vision) of the two witnesses, follow the sixth trumpet"—C. B.

1. Another mighty angel—"another from that mighty angel mentioned in Rev. 5. 2; yet he was a created angel, for he did not swear by himself (ver. 6). Clothed with a cloud—in token of his high dignity. And a rainbow upon his head—a lovely token of the Divine favour, and yet it is not too glorious for a creature: the woman (Rev. 12. 1) is described more glorious still. And his face as the sun. Nor is this too much for a creature; for all the righteous 'shall shine forth as the sun.' (Matt. 13. 43.) And his feet as pillars of fire—bright as flame"—WESLEY.

On the other hand, many have thought the description strikingly appropriate to the Angel of the Covenant. "The rainbow" (R.V.) gives some support to this idea (ch. 4. 3).

2. A little book open—"a roll little in comparison with the great book (ch. 5. 1) which contained the whole vast scheme of the Divine purposes. This smaller book contained only a portion, which S. John was now to make his own (vers. 9, 11), and then to use in prophesying to others"—P. Right foot on the sea, and left foot upon the earth—claiming both for God, soon to be cleared of the usurper and his followers.

3. Seven thunders (R.V. "The seven thunders"). Prophetic use of the article; "the thunders" of which more hereafter.

4. Seal up the things. "(Comp. Dan. 12. 4, 9.) There the use of the words is more logical: Daniel is to write the vision, but not let it be read; contrast in this book ch. 22. 10. Here the word is suggested by the passage in Daniel, but the sealing must be on the apostle's mind and lips. Why the voices of the thunders were not to be written it is idle to guess; it is worse than idle to guess what they were, when the Holy Spirit has purposely concealed them"—C. B.

5, 6, 7. Lifted up his hand to heaven (R.V. "his right hand"). In Dan. 12. 7 the angel lifts up both hands, but here one hand holds the little book. There shall be time no longer. In Daniel, the angel clothed in linen and standing upon the waters sware that "a time, times, and a half" were to interpose before the consummation; here, on the contrary, the angel swears that "there shall be time no longer." Not as the English versions seem to imply, that time shall end and eternity begin; "there shall be time no longer" (R.V. margin, "delay"), but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, then is finished the mystery of God, according to the good tidings which He declared to His servants the prophets (R.V.). The words point out the happy issue of the dark period which has been described. The office of the prophets is to receive the good tidings from God and to declare them to others.

9. Take it and eat it up—"thoroughly consider and digest it. Appropriate its contents so entirely as to become part of thyself. This is a repetition, with a difference, of one of Ezekiel's visions. (Ezek. 2. 8; 3. 3.) It will make thy belly bitter—this Ezekiel's roll did not do. We may presume that this little book, like the Old Testament one, contained 'lamentations and mourning and woe.' To both prophets, the first result of absorbing the words of God and making them their own (Jer. 15. 16) is delight at communion with Him and enlightenment by Him; but the priest of Jehovah did not feel, as the disciple of Jesus did, the afterthought of bitterness, the Christ-like sorrow for those against whom God's wrath is revealed, who knew not the time of their visitation"—C. B.

11. And he said (R.V. "And they say")—an indefinite expression for "it was said unto me." Before many peoples (R.V. "over many peoples," margin, "concerning"). Probably a personal warning to the apostle himself; he was to see the end of all things in vision, but his own earthly work and duties were not at an end.

CHAPTER XI.

Vers. 1–14. MEASURING THE TEMPLE—THE TWO WITNESSES.—The Temple is measured, to mark off and secure the shrine, the true Church of God; the outer court is left to the Gentiles, indicating that practical heathenism and corruption have invaded the Church. Against these things witnesses are raised up; their power is great, though their testimony is disregarded; their influence outlasts their lives, and their words avenge them on their adversaries. Whatever corruptions invade the Church, the kernel of the Church will never be destroyed, but out of it will arise those who will be true, and whose words will have power.

1. A reed like unto a rod—measuring reed. (Ezek. 40. 3; Rev. 21. 15.) Possibly the canon or rule of Scripture, completed by S. John. A rod—"of iron which cannot be bent or broken, but will break its foes in pieces"—W. W. The Temple. The word used is not that for the whole Temple precinct, but the Temple in its narrowest sense, what in the Old Testament is called "the house" or "the palace."

2. Tread under foot. (So Luke 21. 24, which is doubtless referred to.) "Hitherto the correspondences in this book with that prophecy of our Lord have been closest with S. Matthew's version of it. Varying parallels like these authenticate the reports of His words in the different Gospels, showing that they are to be taken as mutually supplementary. Of course S. John did not use our Gospels (though S. Matthew's at least was in existence), but wrote independently from his own recollection"—C. B. Forty and two months. "The period of time here mentioned is the same as the 'one thousand two hundred and threescore days' during which the woman fled into the wilderness, ch. 12. 6. Both visions refer, doubtless, to the same event"—W. W. The same period as Daniel's "time, times, and a half." (Dan. 12. 14.) "The incorporation of the expressions used by Daniel remind us that the principles of God's government are the same in all ages, that the principles illustrated in one series of historical events are likely to receive similar illustration in after times. The words of Daniel were not exhausted in the age of Antiochus, nor the visions of the Apocalypse in the overthrow of any one nation or the corruption of any one church. The future may bring further light; for the present the period of forty-two months, the equivalent of three years and a half (the half of seven, the perfect number), is the symbol of a period limited in length; it is the time of the world's power, during which it seems to triumph, but it will not last for ever"—ELLICOTT.

3. My two witnesses—"a small and yet a competent number. As God raised up prophets in the ancient Church to witness against the idolatrous corruptions of religion, so there shall be some in every age to testify against the iniquity and idolatry of their times"—C. B. A thousand two hundred and threescore days—the same period as the forty-two months, or three years and a half, the year being reckoned only as three hundred and sixty days. In sackcloth—evidently referring to the "rough garments" of the prophets. (2 Kings 1. 8; Zech. 13. 4.)

4. The two olive trees—referring to the vision of Zechariah. (Ch. 4. 3, 11, 12.) "That is, as Zerubbabel and Joshua were then the chosen instruments in God's hand, even so shall these be in their season. Being full themselves of the unction of the Holy One, they shall continually transmit the same to others. And the two candlesticks—burning and shining lights—standing before the Lord—always waiting on God, without the help of man"—WESLEY.

5, 6. Fire proceedeth out of their mouth. Power to shut heaven . . . over waters. The references are to the history of Elijah (1 Kings 17. 1; 2 Kings 1. 10) and to the miracles of Moses (Ex. 4. 9; 7. 17-20).

7. The Beast—here first mentioned. "This Beast will meet us again in chaps 13 and 17, where we shall see it is the concentrated power of a world material and visible, in opposition to a world spiritual and invisible"—E.

9, 10. "Their corpses remain unburied; there are congratulations and rejoicings, but the forms of the witnesses, though silent, witness still. Even in an age of religious and social anarchy, silent tokens of a better order remain"—ELLICOTT. The great city . . . Sodom—Egypt, where their Lord was crucified. It has been argued that the "great city" must be Rome. "The characteristic of Sodom is impurity; of Egypt, tyranny; of Jerusalem, apostasy. Hence Rome is called Sodom, Egypt, and Jerusalem, as having the three characteristics united"—W. W. Others argue that Jerusalem is clearly pointed out as the city. So E., adding, however, "If this city be Jerusalem, what does it represent? We have the degenerate Church before us, the Church that has conformed to the world. Christ was crucified in the midst of the then existing professing Church of God; His witnesses were martyred in the midst of the nominal Christian Church. This interpretation appears to harmonise the best with the symbolism of the vision."

11. Three days and a half. "Like her Lord, the Church will have her dark passion week, followed by the bright resurrection morn. It is a curious historical coincidence that, at the fifth Lateran Council, May 5, 1514, no witness (not even the Moravians who were summoned) testified for the truth, as Huss and Jerome did at Constance; an orator ascended the tribunal before the representatives of Papal Christendom, and said, 'There is no reclaimant, no opponent.' Exactly three years and a half after, on October 31, 1517, Luther posted up his famous theses on the church-door at Wittenberg. If this prophecy be allowed other fulfilments, beside the final and literal one under the last Antichrist, this may fairly be regarded as one"—P.

12. In a cloud (R.V. "In the cloud")—the same, perhaps, which received their Lord out of His disciples' sight.

13. The tenth part of the city—a considerable part of the powers of the idolatrous Church. Seven thousand—uniting the two mystical and perfect numbers, to indicate the complete destruction of the impenitent. Gave glory. Expressive of gratitude (Luke 17. 18); of humility (Acts 12. 23); but here the reference is more probably to the Old Testament (Josh. 7. 19), confession of sin. Good is effected even through fear; unlike those who repented not (ch. 9. 21), they give glory to the God of heaven.

14. The second woe—including the punishment of those who rejected the two witnesses, as well as the invasion of the horsemen (ch. 9).

Vers. 15-19. THE SEVENTH TRUMPET.—15. "Whatever view we adopt concerning the interpretation of the Apocalypse must be governed by the declared fact that the seventh trumpet brings us to the very end (ch. 10. 7)"—ELLICOTT. The kingdoms of this world (R.V. "The kingdom of the world"). His Christ. (See Luke 2. 26; Acts 4. 26.) Of course the language originates in the Old Testament, "The Lord's Anointed." He shall reign for ever and ever. "There is no contradiction between this statement of S. John and that of S. Paul, when, speaking of the Son, the latter apostle says, 'And when all things have been subjected under Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subjected unto Him that did subject all things under Him, that God may be all in all' (1 Cor. 15. 28). The kingdom spoken of by S. Paul is that exercised by our Lord in subduing His enemies, and it must necessarily come to an end when there are no more enemies to subdue. The kingdom here is Christ's dominion as Head and King of His Church, and of that dominion there is no end"—E.

16. Elders which sit before God on their thrones (R.V.). "Christ's servants crowned with Him, and sharing His sovereignty"—ELLICOTT.

18. The time of the dead to be judged, and to give their reward—rewards of various degree, according to the character and the service—prophets, saints, them that fear Thy name. And so punishment proportioned to the nature and degree of the offence. Here is the last and greatest woe. The overthrow of the evil kingdom brings ruin to those who have obstinately supported it.

19. There was opened the temple of God. "More open discoveries were made to the Seer, a clearer revelation of the innermost and most spiritual truths of the gospel"—W. W. Lightnings and voices. "So ch. 8. 5; 16. 8: in all three places they mark the end of the series of seven signs"—C. B.

CHAPTER XII.

Vers. 1–6. THE WOMAN WITH THE MAN CHILD.—1. A great wonder (R.V. "A great sign"). A woman clothed with the sun—"the Jewish Church, the ideal Israel"—C. B. "The Old Testament congregation of God"—P. "The Church invested with the light of Divine truth, of spiritual life"—W. W.

2. Being with child. "The woman's travail pains represent the Old Testament believers' ardent longings for the promised Redeemer"—P. "The Church fulfilling her destiny even in pain. Her work is to bring forth Christ to men, and not to be satisfied till Christ be formed in them"—ELLICOTT. (Isa. 66. 7; Gal. 4. 19.)

3. A great red dragon—the emblem of the evil spirit, the devil. "The word 'dragon' in classical Greek means simply 'serpent,' though perhaps it was always specially applied to the larger or more formidable kinds"—C. B. Seven heads and ten horns—"implying vast wisdom, and mighty power and strength. Seven diadems on his heads—such as kings anciently wore; for, though fallen, he was a great potentate still, even the prince of this world"—WESLEY.

4. The third part of the stars—"the light-bearers, the illustrious, to whom God gave high place that they might be burning lights for Him"—ELLICOTT. Devour the child. So the dragon, Egypt, was ready to devour Israel's males at the birth of the nation; so Herod slew the male children, seeking to destroy the infant Christ. (Dan. 8. 10; Ex. 1. 16.)

5. And she brought forth a man child—"even Christ, considered not in His person, but in His kingdom"—WESLEY.

To rule all nations with a rod of iron—identifying Him with the King predicted in Ps. 2. 9. Child caught up to God—"taken utterly out of his reach"—WESLEY.

6. The woman fled into the wilderness. "Mary's flight with Jesus into Egypt was a type of this"—P. That they may feed her there—indefinite for "that she may be fed." A thousand two hundred and threescore days. "This wilderness life of the Church continues during the whole Christian era, during the whole period of witnessing. (Ch. 11. 3.) Always in the wilderness, so long as her Lord is personally absent, she eats heavenly food and drinks living water"—E.

Vers. 7–12. THE WAR IN HEAVEN.—7. There was war in heaven. "This must refer to an event subsequent to the Incarnation, not therefore to the 'fall of the angels,' as readers of Paradise Lost are apt to assume"—C. B. "It is the overthrow of the evil spirit by Christ, the victory of Bethlehem, Calvary, and Olivet, which is commemorated, and the effects of which transcend the sphere of things seen"—ELLICOTT. Michael. See Dan. 10. 13, 21; 12. 1, where he is represented as the guardian angel of Israel. See also Jude 9, where he is called "the archangel," and is evidently a created being. "It may be a kind of type name, and so employed in this passage to denote Him who is the Captain of our salvation"—ELLICOTT.

9. That old serpent. "This is justly understood to be an allusion to the temptation and fall of man (Gen. 3. 1), and a proof that 'the serpent' was the evil one under the form of that reptile"—W. W. Was cast out (R.V. "down"). "This war describes the conflict between Christianity and heathenism, represented as carried on between the spiritual powers which rule the contending systems, and decided in favour of the former before the actual agents in the warfare come into conflict. The overthrow and downcasting of Satan and his angels is probably a figure taken from a reality, of which there are elsewhere similar intimations. (Luke 10. 18; John 12. 31)"—W. W.

11. By the blood of the Lamb (R.V. "Because of the blood"). They loved not their lives unto the death. "The spirit of such devotion has breathed in thousands who have not died the martyr's death. The martyr spirit needs not death to show itself"—ELLICOTT.

12, 13. Rejoice, O heavens . . . Woe for the earth and for the sea! for the devil is gone down unto you. "Although the fall of the angels from their first estate may be remotely hinted at, the vision refers to the spiritual contest begun after the resurrection of Jesus; and we ask our readers to pay particular attention to the double relation of Satan to mankind referred to in it; his subjection to the righteous; and the subjection of the wicked (the earth, the men of the world), to him"—E.

Vers. 13–17. THE PRESERVATION OF THE WOMAN.—13. Dragon persecuted the woman. The discourse, interrupted by the episode in vers. 7–12, is here resumed.

14. The two wings of the great eagle (R.V.), that she might fly into the wilderness. "There can be little doubt as to the allusion. The great eagle is that of which God Himself spake to Moses. (Ex. 19. 3, 4.) 'I bear you on eagle's wings.' (See also Deut. 32. 11, 12)"—E. In the manifold symbolism of this book it is quite possible that we may also recognise here the wing of the great eagle of the Roman standard, which protected S. Paul and many more in the infancy of the Church.

15. Earth helped the woman. "As Persia was raised up to release Israel from Babylon, so does help come to the persecuted Church from the cultured Roman world. But the passage demands a wider interpretation. By the flood we understand all popular movements against Christianity. They diffuse themselves for a time, but mother earth absorbs them all. The eternal laws of truth and right ultimately prove the strongest. It is not one nation only, or one age, that is represented here; it is an eternal law"—ELLICOTT.

CHAPTER XIII.

VERS. 1-10. THE BEAST FROM THE SEA.—The way in which the Dragon carries out his plan of war is described. Two monsters rise at his bidding, one from the sea, one from the earth, one distinguished by mere brutal, the other by more subtle power.

1. I stood (R.V. "He stood")—that is, the Dragon. A beast coming out of the sea—not the same word for "beast" as in ch. 4. 7; this means "wild beast." "The sea" is described (ch. 17. 15) as "peoples, multitudes, nations, and tongues." Seven heads, ten horns, ten crowns. "The description carries us back to Dan 7. 2-8. In both cases there is the same origin, the sea swept by strong winds; in both cases the same animals are referred to, though in the vision of Daniel they are separated; in that of John, combined; in both cases mention is made of ten horns; so far, therefore, we can have little hesitation in affirming the conclusion arrived at by most commentators, that in this 'beast coming out of the sea' we have an emblem of that power of the world, which, under the guidance of the prince of the world, opposes and persecutes the Church of Christ"—E.

2. The dragon gave him his power. "It is the devil's interest and policy to disguise his working under the forms of the world; at present he has actually persuaded many to disbelieve his existence"—C. B.

3. One of his heads wounded . . . healed (R.V. "Smitten to death, and his death-stroke was healed"). "A comparison of ch. 17. 8-11 shows that it is to the sixth, or Roman, head that S. John intends his language to refer. It is upon the Beast in his resurrection state that we are to dwell. In that condition he is not described as raging only in the Roman Empire, his influence is universal; 'authority over every tribe and people, and tongue and nation,' in fact, all save the godly, whose names are written in the book of life; and that influence is to continue through all the history of the Church, the 'forty and two months' so often referred to in this prophecy. What, then, can this first Beast be? Not simply Rome, either pagan or papal; not any single form of earthly government, however strong; not any Roman emperor, however vicious and cruel, but the general influence of the world, in so far as it is opposed to God"—E. "It has been thought that this indicates the death of Nero, and his expected reappearance as Antichrist"—C. B. "Considered by most as representing the subversion of the imperial authority in the time of Augustulus, A.D. 476, and the re-establishment of a great secular, as well as ecclesiastical dominion at Rome under the popes"—W. W. "More than one wound seems to be meant, for instance, that under Constantine, when the pagan worship gave way to Christianity, followed by the healing, when image worship and other papal errors were introduced into the Church; and again, that at the Reformation, followed by the lethargic 'form of godliness without the power'"—P.

10. He that leadeth into captivity (R.V. "If any man is for captivity, into captivity he goeth"). The Greek text, as R.V. notes, is uncertain. The most probable meaning is that the "patience and faith" of the saints will be shown by the submission to captivity or to death for the sake of Christ.

Vers. 11-16. THE BEAST FROM THE EARTH.—11. Another Beast—"afterwards called the false prophet (chaps. 16. 13; 19. 20; 20. 10). Two horns like a lamb. No doubt the obvious view is right, that he looks like Christ, and is like Satan"—C. B. "The first beast is physical and political, the second a spiritual power, the power of knowledge, ideas, and scientific cultivation. Both alike are beasts, from below, not from above; faithful allies, worldly anti-Christian wisdom standing in the service of the worldly anti-Christian power"—P. Out of the earth. "The sea represents the tumultuous impulses and passions of mankind; the earth, society consolidated and disciplined by culture. But the wisdom is earthly, sensual, devilish"—ELLICOTT.

13. Doeth great wonders, maketh fire to come down. (See Matt. 24. 24; 2 Thess. 2. 9; also 1 Kings 18. and 2 Kings 1.) Here is the false prophet, imitating the wonders wrought by God's faithful servant in a distant and darker age.

15. The image of the Beast. "It is certainly relevant to remember how the refusal of worship to the Emperor's image was made the test of Christianity in the primitive persecutions, perhaps especially by humane and reluctant persecutors like Pliny (see his famous letter to Trajan), who acted not from fanaticism, but from supposed political necessity"—C. B.

16. A mark in their right hand—"such a brand as masters stamp on their slaves; soldiers voluntarily punctured their arms with the mark of the general under whom they served; votaries of idols branded themselves with the idol's symbol"—P.

18. Here is wisdom. "The terms of the challenge serve at once to show that the feat proposed is possible, and that it is difficult"—ALFORD. Six hundred threescore and six. "In Hebrew and in Greek letters were used for numerals, every letter having its own proper significance as a number. There are an indefinite number of proper names whose letters will amount to six hundred and sixty-six, either in Hebrew or Greek. Neither Lateinos, that is, Latinus, nor Nerôn Kesâr, that is, Nero Cæsar, adopted by many modern interpreters, is convincing. The letters of 'Lateinos' must be taken with their numeral value in Greek, those of 'Nerôn Késar' as Hebrew"—C. B. "We must not look upon the second Beast as a successor, but rather as a supporter of the first. (See ver. 12, R.V. 'in his sight.') Some see in it the pagan priesthood aiding the imperial power; others the papal sacerdotal power, heir of pagan rites; others would combine the two, and describe the second Beast as the sacerdotal persecutor, pagan or Christian. I believe, that though there is truth in these views, the stretch of the vision embraces more than these. All who use their culture, their knowledge, their wisdom, to teach men that there is nothing worthy of worship save what they see and touch and taste, are acting the part of the second Beast"—ELLICOTT.

CHAPTER XIV.

VERS. 1-5. VISION OF THE LAMB AND HIS SERVANTS. — 1. His Father's name (R.V. "His name and the name of His Father"). "Notice that it is assumed as understood, that the Lamb is the Son of God"—C. B. (Ch. 3. 12; 7. 3.) A hundred forty and four thousand. "Introductory to the announcement of judgments about to descend upon the ungodly world (vers. 8-11, anticipatory of ch. 18. 2-6) stand here the redeemed, the Divine kernel of humanity"—P. (See ch. 7. 4.) On Mount Zion. "They are in full possession of their Christian privileges and joys. Not in heaven, in the ordinary sense of the term"—E.

2. A voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters. "The harpers and song are in heaven, but the hundred and forty-four thousand are on earth"—ALFORD.

3. As it were a new song. "In truth, as old as God's eternal purpose"—P.

4, 5. These are they. "The characteristics of the servants of the Lamb. The first is purity—they are virgins (not led astray by the tempters who jointly constitute the spiritual 'harlot'); the next is implicit obedience—they follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth; the third is separation or unworldliness—redeemed from among men; the fourth, utter truthfulness—no guile"—ELLICOTT. Firstfruits unto God. (See Jas. 1. 18.) "Not simply as the first portion of the Church on earth, to be followed by a larger portion, but as the first portion of a kingdom of God wider and larger than the Church. The whole Church is God's firstfruits; when she is laid upon the altar we have the promise that a time is coming when creation shall follow in her train, when it shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God"—E.

Vers. 6-11. PREPARATION FOR JUDGMENT. —6, 7. The everlasting Gospel (R.V. "An eternal Gospel"). "A remarkable contrast to the great city vaunting herself 'eternal,' in contrast also to the doctrines of the Beast and the false prophet"—W. W. "The preaching of the Gospel here stands in the same relation to God's judgment as in Matt. 24. 4. But notice that the name is applied to the whole truth of God, not to what was revealed by Christ only; for the substance of the angel's message is pure natural Theism"—C. B. "The designation of God, as the one Creator of all things, shows that this proclamation of the Gospel is made especially to the heathen, to idolaters, to worshippers of gods many and lords many"—W. W. (Acts 14. 15; 17. 24.)

8. Babylon is fallen (R.V. "Fallen, fallen, is Babylon the great"). "The proclamation of the fall of Babylon follows the flight of the angel with the everlasting gospel. The sequence is not merely chronological, but that of cause and effect"—W. W. "The principles of Christ's gospel must undermine the world-power; the fall of some Babylon principle has almost always followed the age of spiritual revival"—ELLICOTT.

9, 10, 11. The wine of the wrath of God. "She makes them drink of the cup of her fornication (ch. 17. 2), and she is made, and they with her, to drink of the cup of God's wrath (ver. 10; ch. 16. 9). In ver. 8, 18. 6, as in Jer. 51. 7, from which the image is taken, there is a combination of the two"—C. B. Without mixture. Wine was seldom drunk "without mixture," that is "undiluted." "Babylon has given all nations to drink of deadly wine, emblem of some principles which have been more or less accepted by all nations, and which will involve them in the consequences of her fall"—ELLICOTT. In the presence. "It is impossible to translate these words otherwise; they prove that the holy angels, and the Lamb Himself, acquiesce, or something more, in the justice and necessity of God's awful judgments"—C. B.

Ver. 13. THE HAPPINESS OF THE FAITHFUL DEAD.—13. From henceforth. The reason for these words is to be found in the state of trouble the last verse describes; the righteous are happy in being taken away from the evil to come. Their works follow them (R.V. "Follow with them"). "Their works are specified because respect is had to the coming judgment, when every man shall be judged according to his works. His works do not go before the believer, nor even by his side, but follow him, at the same time that they go with him as a proof that he is Christ's"—P.

Vers. 14-20. THE HARVEST AND THE VINTAGE. — 14. Like unto the Son of Man. The Son of Man speaks of the harvest, Matt. 9. 37, 38; 13. 29, 30. A golden crown—"a garland of victory, not His diadem as a King"—P.

15. Another angel came out of the temple—"the 'shrine'; the word shows that he comes from the immediate presence of God, and is a messenger from Him. Therefore it is that he can say, Thrust in thy sickle. The Father hath committed all judgment to the Son"—E. "What harvest is this? It is the gathering of the good seed, the full corn in the ear, into the heavenly garner"—ELLICOTT.

17, 18. Angel came out from the altar. The two scenes, one in ch. 6. 9, 10, the other in ch. 8. 5, must be remembered in connection with this angel who has power over fire (Greek, "the fire"). The vine of the earth—"a vintage, not a harvest of grain, is here before us; it is impossible to doubt that the seer draws a broad line of distinction. The latter is the harvest of the good, the former is the vintage of the evil. The grapes are gathered to be trodden in the winefat, and the juice trodden out had the colour of blood"—E. (Joel 3. 12, 13; Isa. 63. 2. 4.)

20. Unto the horse bridles. "Probably the A.V. is right, that it is meant as a mere measure, that any horseman riding there would find his horse bridle-deep in blood"—C. B. One thousand six hundred furlongs. Four is the numerical symbol of the earth; "four by four, multiplied again by one hundred, is symbolical of a judgment complete and full, and reaching to all corners of the world"—ELLICOTT. N.B.—"The harvest of the good is gathered in by the Lord Himself, that of the wicked by His angel. Is there not a beauty and tenderness in this contrast? It is as though that Son of Man and Son of God who is judge of quick and dead, Judge alike of the righteous and the wicked, loved one half of His office and loved not the other. It is as though He cherished as His own prerogative the harvest of the earth, and were glad to delegate to other hands the vintage. It is as though the ministry of mercy were His chosen office, and the ministry of wrath His stern necessity"—VAUGHAN.

CHAPTER XV.

VERS. 1-4. PREPARATION FOR THE SEVEN LAST PLAGUES — TRIUMPH OF THE CONQUERORS. — 1. Seven last plagues (R.V. "Seven plagues which are the last, for in them is finished the wrath of God").

2. "Again, as in chaps. 7 and 11. 16-18, and 14. 1-5, a vision of the blessedness of the faithful is interposed in the represented progress of events, forming a pause which may be compared to the choral ode in the Greek drama"—W. W. Sea of glass mingled with fire—"the calm translucent sea of God's counsels of righteousness and love, now clear as crystal, now ruddy with the fire of righteous indignation"—ELLICOTT. "The visible utterance of His holiness will be clear and transparent to all at the last; mingled with fire, as in the history of the world the wrath and indignation of God against sin find their utterance no less than His love"—TRENCH.

4. The song of Moses. "The song of Moses was a pæan of victory over Pharaoh and his hosts. Israel stood on the margin of the Red Sea, and saw the overthrow of the great world-power of the day; so these saints stand by the sea of glass, and sing the song of triumph over the great world-powers of every age. The cases are parallel, and the songs are alike"—ELLICOTT. Thou King of saints (R.V. "King of the ages"). Thou only art holy—"not the same word as is applied to God in ch. 4. 8, etc.; but ordinarily used of human piety or holiness, and in that sense applied to our Lord in His human character in Heb. 7. 26. It is only used of God here, and in ch. 16. 5; in both cases the sense is that God is justified in His saying, and clear when He is judged"—C. B.

Vers. 5-8. THE ANGELS OF THE PLAGUES—5. The temple of the tabernacle. "We need to get a glimpse within the holy place to understand the secret spring and the end of God's righteous dealings"—P.

6. Clothed in pure and white linen (R.V. "with precious stone, pure and bright"). The difference in the Greek between "linen" and "stone" is only in one letter. In vindication of the reading adopted by R.V. see Ezek. 29. 13. Their breasts girded. The angels are about to engage in priestly work, and are girded as the Lord Himself was in the vision of the first chapter. (See ch. 1. 13, and note.)

7. Golden vials (R.V. "golden bowls"). A broad shallow cup or bowl. "The breadth of the vials in their upper part would tend to cause their contents to pour our all at once, implying the overwhelming suddenness of the plagues"—P. Full of the wrath of God. The vials full of odours contrast with these; on the other hand, the censer filled with fire from the altar and cast into the earth conveys a similar idea. (Ch. 5. 8; 8. 5.)

8. Smoke from the glory of God. (See Isa. 6. 4.) No man able to enter—because of God's presence in manifested glory and power during the execution of these judgments (Ex. 40. 35; 1 Kings 8. 11; 2 Chron. 5. 14.)

CHAPTER XVI.

THE SEVEN VIALS.—1. Great voice out of the temple—"from the midst of the smoke or cloud. It was the voice of God. (Ex. 24. 16.) The first four vials are distinguished from the last three, just as in the case of the seven seals and the seven trumpets. The first four are more general, affecting the earth, the sea, the springs, and the sun; and not merely a portion of these natural bodies, as in the case of the trumpets, but the whole of them, the last three are more particular"—P.

2. A noisome and grievous sore. "The plagues that accompany these vials have a close analogy to those of the trumpets in ch. 8, and, like them, have some to the plagues of Egypt"—C. B. (See Ex. 9. 9.)

5. The angel of the waters—"presiding over the waters. The energy of the material universe seems, like the giving of the Law, to be committed to the disposition of angels"—C. B. Thou art righteous (R.V. "Righteous art Thou, which art and which wast, Thou Holy One"). Judged thus—lit. "these things," didst inflict this judgment.

7. Another out of the altar (R.V. "I heard the altar saying"). On it the prayers of saints are presented before God; beneath it are the souls of the martyrs crying for vengeance on the enemies of God.

8, 9. Upon the sun. Whereas by the fourth trumpet the sun is darkened (ch. 8. 12) in a third part, here by the fourth vial the sun's scorching power is intensified. Repented not to give Him glory. Affliction, if it does not melt, hardens the sinner. Compare the better result on others, ch. 11. 13.

10. The seat of the Beast (R.V. "the throne")—set up in mimicry of God's throne; the dragon gave his throne to the beast (ch. 13. 2). Gnawed their tongues for pain—"through rage at the baffling of their hopes and the overthrow of their kingdom"—GROTIUS.

11. Their pains and their sores—resulting from the former plagues, were aggravated by the darkness; there was an accumulation, not a mere succession, of plagues.

12. The river Euphrates . . . the kings of the East. Perhaps no passage, even in this difficult book, has been more variously interpreted. The two following are examples of the different conclusions arrived at by comparatively recent writers:—(1) "The waters of the Euphrates are the spiritual and temporal powers of the spiritual Babylon, the apostate church, of which Rome is the chief, though not the exclusive representative. The phrase way may be prepared for is that applied to the Lord's coming. (Isa. 40. 3; Matt. 3. 3; Luke 1. 76.) He shall come from the East (Matt. 24. 27; Ezek. 43. 2), not alone, for His elect transfigured saints, of Israel and the Gentiles, shall accompany Him, who are 'kings and priests unto God.' As the anti-Christian ten kings accompany the beasts, so the saints as kings accompany the King of kings to the final decisive conflict"—P. (2) "The Euphrates was the natural boundary, dividing and protecting the Jewish people from the great empires of the East. In the great struggle between the kingdoms of Christ and the world, the Euphrates represents the great separating boundary, the great impediment to war. There is a great interposed boundary of public opinion which prevents evil from breaking forth in its ruder and more violent forms. There may come a time when public sentiment loses all sense of shame, and the decorums of life are swept away. Then is the Euphrates dried. The kings of the East represent the forces of rude and open evil which have been long restrained"—ELLICOTT. We may indeed be thankful that the study of essential Christian doctrine, and of personal Christian duty, presents no such difficulty as the study of unfulfilled prophecy.

13. Unclean spirits like frogs. "The false prophet here first named, but, as if well known, is evidently identical with the second Beast of ch. 13. 11. (Comp. the description given there with ch. 19. 20.) The unclean spirits proceed one from the mouth of each of these personifications of evil. By their issuing from the mouth is indicated that they are utterances, promulgated opinions and doctrines, publications"—W. W. "The three radical foes of Christ and His righteousness: the dragon, representing the hate of evil spirits; the wild beast, representing the hostility of the world-power; the false prophet, representing the antagonism of world culture and intellectualism, send forth each their emissary, appealing to the pride and passions of men"—ELLICOTT. "The dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, 'the mystery of iniquity,' form a blasphemous anti-Trinity, the counterfeit of 'the mystery of godliness,' God manifest in Christ, witnessed to by the Spirit"—P. Like frogs—"antitype of the plague of frogs in Egypt. The imitation of the plague of frogs was the final effort of the magicians; with this their power ceased"—W. W. (Ex. 8. 15, 19.)

14. To gather them to the battle. This is exactly the action and effect of the diffusion and prevalence of opinion.

15. I come as a thief. "S. John apparently hears, and writes down as he hears, the words of Christ spoken in the midst of his vision. The image is that of Matt. 24. 43, though in the phrase there may be a reminiscence of the different image of Luke 12. 37"—C. B.

16. He gathered them (R.V. "they gathered them"), viz. the unclean spirits. Armageddon (R.V. "Har-Magedon"). "The meaning, according as we read Ar or Har is 'the city' or 'the mountain of Megiddo'"—C. B. (See Judg. 5. 19; 2 Kings 23. 29, 30; Zech. 12. 11.) "The old battleground becomes the symbol of the decisive struggle. It is raised in meaning; it is a type, not a locality"—ELLICOTT.

17. It is done. "This voice is from the temple, where is the ark of the covenant, the place of mediation and intercession; and from the throne—the seat of Divine power and glory. It is the same voice which cried from the cross, 'It is finished,' an utterance recorded by S. John only"—W. W. (John 19. 30; ch. 21. 6.)

18. Voices, thunderings, lightnings, earthquake. "This is the same close as that of the seven seals and the seven trumpets, but with the difference that they do not merely form the conclusion, but introduce the consequence, of the last vial, namely, the utter destruction of Babylon and of the anti-Christian armies"—P.

21. A great hail. "The symbol is from the plague of hail in Egypt. (Ex. 9. 24.) The weight of a talent—a strong figure to denote the greatness and severity of the Divine judgments. (Josh. 10. 11.) The Jewish talent was a hundred and fourteen pounds"—W. W. Men blasphemed God—"continue obstinate; remain incorrigible under the visitation of God's wrath"—W. W.

CHAPTER XVII.

VERS. 1-6. THE GREAT HARLOT—HER POMP. —"At the close of ch. 16 we reach the end of the three great series of judgments which constitute the chief contents of the Revelation—the seals, the trumpets, the bowls. It cannot surprise us, however, that at this point other visions of judgment are to follow. Already we had apparently reached the end at ch. 6. 17, and again ch. 11. 18; yet on both occasions the same general subject was resumed, and the same truths presented, though in a different aspect and with heightened colouring"—E.

1. I will show unto thee the judgment. The fall of Babylon has been already announced (ch. 14. 8); but before the description of her fall there is given an account of her state and character, that there may be no mistake in the application. The great whore. This term is applied to the Jewish Church (Isa. 1. 21; Jer. 2. 10); and it is here applied to a branch of the Christian Church that had corrupted itself. Many waters. (See ver. 15.)

3. Into the wilderness. "In ch. 12. 6 we read, 'The woman fled into the wilderness,' where the woman signifies the Church in its purity. The reference to 'the wilderness' here intimates, after the manner of the Apocalypse, that this personification is in a certain specific relation to the other. Where we look for the woman of ch. 12. 6, we find this woman. In the place of the true Church is the false apostate Church, the nominal Church in a corrupt state"—W. W. A scarlet-coloured Beast—"undoubtedly the same as the Beast of ch. 13. 1-8, though then his colour was not mentioned. It is symbolic (comp. that of the dragon, ch. 12, 3), as being the colour of blood; perhaps also suggestive of the imperial purple"—C. B.

4. Arrayed in purple and scarlet. "Whenever and wherever (not in Rome alone), the Church, instead of being as at first, 'clothed with the sun' of heaven, is arrayed in earthly meretricious gauds, compromising the truth of God through fear, or flattery, of the world's power, she becomes the harlot seated on the Beast, and doomed in righteous retribution to be judged by the Beast"—P.

5. Upon her forehead was a name written—"probably not branded on the flesh, but tied on as a label, as Roman harlots actually did wear their names"—C. B. Mystery, Babylon the Great. The use of the word "mystery" in ch. 1. 20 may illustrate its meaning here; it indicates that "Babylon the Great" is to be understood in a mystical sense, Mother of harlots (R.V. "of the harlots and of the abominations"). "Not merely Rome, but Christendom as a whole, even as formerly Israel as a whole, has become a harlot. The invisible Church of true believers is hidden and dispersed in the visible Church. The boundary lines, which separate 'harlot' and 'woman,' are not denominational, nor drawn externally, but can only be spiritually discerned. If Rome were the only seat of Babylon, much of the spiritual profit of Revelation would be lost to us; but the harlot 'sitteth upon many waters' (ver. 1), and 'all nations have drunk of the wine of her fornication' (ver. 2)"—P. "Fornication and adultery throughout the Old Testament represent religious degeneracy, not civil misrule"—E.

6. Drunk with the blood of saints. "The words might apply both to Pagan and to Christian Rome, as both in their turns have cruelly persecuted the saints and martyrs of Jesus; but the latter is more deserving of the character, as Christian Rome has far exceeded heathen Rome in the extent of her persecutions; while the words I wondered put the matter beyond doubt, as it would not be at all surprising for heathens to persecute Christians, whereas to find a professedly Christian power drunk with the blood of saints might well be matter of astonishment"—W. W.

8. The beast was, and is not. "On the whole, ancient tradition where it speaks, and modern criticism, agree in the interpretation of these words. Nero, who killed himself in June (A.D. 68), 'had been, and was not' at the date of this vision; but his reappearance was looked for by many, with various feelings of hope and fear. When his dethronement and execution were imminent, it was said that he had talked of going to the East, and establishing his throne at Jerusalem; while one form of the belief that he survived, was that he had fled to the Parthians, and would return under their protection. It is possible S. John means to tell us that the Antichrist who is to come will be Nero risen from the dead; more probably, Antichrist will be a new Nero as he will be a new Antiochus, typified by them, inasmuch as they were actuated by his spirit"—C. B. And shall ascend. "This determines the rise of the Beast to a period subsequent to the delivery of this prediction, though its existence is expressly affirmed to have been prior. This description remarkably applies to Rome as a power, civil and ecclesiastical. It was—existed in its original secular and imperial form; is not—comes to an end in the 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire' (receives a deadly wound, ch. 13. 3); and shall ascend out of the abyss. In the rise and development of the papal domination its deadly wound is healed"—W. W. "An Antichrist is before us, who has been slaughtered unto death, and the stroke of whose death shall be healed. The Beast exhibits marks which show that he had both died and passed through death, the counterpart of the Lamb standing as if he had been slaughtered" —E.

10. Seven mountains . . . seven kings. "According to the view that the beast is not the Roman Empire, but an embodiment of the worldly imperial spirit, it is plausibly held that the 'kings' are kingdoms or empires, like the kings of Persia and Grecia in Dan. 8.—that they are the four kingdoms of Dan. 2. and 7., together with Egypt and Assyria that came before Babylon, and the kingdoms of modern Europe that come after Rome. On this view the ten horns are all on one head; it is this ten-horned head which receives the deadly wound of ch. 13. 3; that is, the beast is nearly slain, the empire as an evil and persecuting power overthrown, by the conversion, first of the later emperors, and then of the sovereigns of Europe, to Christianity; but he revives, for instance in Julian after Constantine, and again in the neo-paganism of the Renaissance, and in the persecutions of the Reformation"—C. B. "Seven mountains and seven kings; manifestations of the beast in successive eras of oppression; Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, are the first five, Rome is the sixth, and it is in the apostle's days; the seventh will come when Rome has perished, and its mighty empire has been rent in pieces. The pieces will be the ten horns, they cover the whole earth"—E.

14. These shall make war with the Lamb —"in league with the Beast; this is a summary anticipation of ch. 19. 19. This shall not be till after they have first executed judgment on the harlot (vers. 15, 16)"—P. They that are with Him (R.V. "They also shall overcome that are with Him, called").

16. The ten horns . . . upon the beast (R.V. "and the beast"). Shall hate the whore. "The Church having apostatised to the world shall have judgment executed upon her first by the world-power, the Beast and its allies; and these afterwards shall have judgment executed upon them by Christ Himself" —P.

18. That great city. "The voices of the Hebrew prophets were lifted up against Babylon; she seemed to them the embodiment of splendid vice and resistless power. In her greatness and her hostility to Jerusalem she became a type of later world-powers, and it is explained in the vision that Babylon is no longer the literal Babylon, but the power which has taken her place of pride and empire. That power was Rome. Rome was in S. John's day just what Babylon had been in the days of the prophets, 'the hammer of the whole earth,' 'the golden cup that made all the earth drunken.' At the same time, the manner in which S. John applied to the Rome of his day the prophetic language which earlier prophets applied to ancient Babylon, ought to be sufficient to warn us against limited and local interpretations, even if the seven-headed wild beast did not show us that the world-power, like the moral principles of which Babylon and Rome are examples, is not confined to one age. If we remember this, we shall see that the Babylon of the Apocalypse, while undoubtedly pagan Rome, cannot be limited to it. Is it then papal Rome? The answer is, In so far as papal Rome has wielded tyrant power, turned persecutor, stood between the spirits of men and Christ, depraved men's consciences, withheld the truth, connived at viciousness, and been a political engine rather than a witness for the righteous King, she has inherited the features of Babylon"—ELLICOTT.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE JUDGMENT OF BABYLON.—1. Earth was lightened with His glory. (See Ezek. 43. 2.)

2, 3. "The fall of the mystical Babylon is described in the sublime and figurative style which Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel employed to foretell the fall of ancient Babylon and Tyre"—W. W. Is fallen—"her destruction is contemplated as certain and near at hand. That she had not actually fallen is clear from the fact that the people of God are commanded to come out of her"—W. W. A habitation of devils. (See Isa. 13. 19, noting that the word "satyrs" was rendered in the LXX. version, "demons.") (Isa. 21. 9; Jer. 51. 8; Isa. 13. 21; 21. 8; 34. 14; Jer. 50. 39; 51. 37; Isa. 14. 23; 34. 11.)

4–6. Come out of her. "In similar language the prophets called upon the people of God to flee from Babylon. (Isa. 48. 20; 52. 11, 12; Jer. 50. 7, 8; 51. 6, 45.) This is a call to reformation, and to severance from the corrupt and apostate Church. It implies also that up to the time of the destruction of the mystical Babylon there will be found in her some of the true people of God. Reward her. Thus God speaks to the executioners of His vengeance. Even as she has rewarded—others, in particular the saints of God. And give her double—this, according to the Hebrew idiom, implies only a full retaliation" —WESLEY. (Gen. 18. 20, 21; Jer. 51. 9; John 1. 2; ch. 16. 19; Ps. 137. 8; Jer. 50. 15, 29; 51. 24, 49; 2 Tim. 4. 14; ch. 13. 10.)

7, 8. I sit as a queen, and am no widow. (See Isa. 47. 7, 8.) "'I sit.' Her usual style. Hence those expressions, 'The chair, or see of Rome; he sat so many years.' As a queen—over many kings, 'mistress of all churches, the supreme, the infallible, the only spouse of Christ; out of which there is no salvation.' And am no widow—but the spouse of Christ. And shall see no sorrow—God Himself will defend 'the Church'"—WESLEY.

She shall be utterly burned with fire. "Literal fire may burn the literal city of Rome, which is situated in the midst of volcanic agencies. But as the harlot city is mystical (the whole faithless Church) the burning may be mainly mystical, symbolising utter destruction and removal"—P. (Isa. 47. 9; Zeph. 2. 15.)

9, 10. The kings of the earth. "Some of the kings will adhere to her, though the rest unite in destroying her"—W. W. "So the 'princes of the sea' take up a lamentation for Tyrus. (Ezek. 26. 16-21.) Contrast the world's 'rejoicing' over the dead bodies of the two witnesses (ch. 11. 10), who had tormented it by their faithfulness, and its 'lamentations over the harlot, who had made the way to heaven smooth"—P. (Jer. 50. 46; Isa. 21. 9.)

11-14. The merchants of the earth. "The enumeration proceeds by gradation from one article to another, till it rises to the bodies and then to the souls of men. The thyine wood was the wood of an African evergreen, a species of cedar or lignum vitæ, from which choice vessels and statues were made. Slaves. Though the New Testament does not directly forbid slavery, which would, in the then state of the world, have incited a slave revolt, it virtually condemns it as here. Souls of men. There may be special reference to the sale of indulgences, and the merchandise of masses for the deliverance of souls from purgatory"—W. W. (Ezek. 27. 13.)

19. Cast dust upon their heads—"as mourners. Most of the expressions here used in describing the downfall of Babylon are taken from Ezekiel's description of the downfall of Tyre. (Ezek. 26. and 27.)"—WESLEY. (Josh. 7. 6; 1 Sam. 4. 2; Job 2. 12.)

21. A stone like a great millstone. "By a like emblem Jeremiah foreshowed the fall of the Chaldæan Babylon"—WESLEY. (Jer. 52. 63, 64.)

22, 23. Harpers and musicians . . . sound of a millstone—"not only the arts that adorn life, but even those employments without which it cannot subsist, will cease from thee for ever"—WESLEY.

24. And in her. "S. John passes from recording the angel's denunciation to the impression made on his own mind by the judgment he witnessed"—C. B. (Jer. 51. 49.)

CHAPTER XIX.

VERS. 1-6. TRIUMPH OVER BABYLON.—1. Alleluia (R.V. "Hallelujah"). Praise ye Jehovah, a form of praise used by the Levites, but ascribed here to all people. (Psalms 106.; 111.; 113.; 146.; 148.-150.)

2. Which did corrupt the earth. "Instead of opposing and lessening, she promoted the sinful life and decay of the world by her own earthliness, allowing the salt to lose its savour"—P.

6. The voice of a great multitude. "This verse is the hearty response to the stirring call. Alleluia, Praise our God, etc. The Lord God omnipotent reigneth—His reign is a fact already established. The overthrow of Babylon clears the way for His advent and recognition. The Beast hardly arises when he at once 'goeth into perdition,' so that Christ is prophetically considered as already reigning, so soon does His advent follow the judgment on the harlot"—P.

Vers. 7-9. THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.—7. The marriage of the Lamb. "The first suggestion of this image in the New Testament is in our Lord's parables (Matt. 22. 2; 25. 1-10); it is more fully worked out by S. Paul (Eph. 5. 22-32). But men's minds were prepared for it by the language of all the prophets about the spiritual marriage of the Lord and Israel, still more perhaps by that of Ps. 45., rising so far above the royal marriage that no doubt furnished its occasion"—C. B.

8. Fine linen, clean and white . . . the righteousness of saints (R.V. "the righteous acts of the saints"). "Every good work done by every single saint goes up to make the perfect glory of the Church as it shall be when at last complete"—C. B. "Those good works which are the evidences of their living faith"—BEZA. (Ps. 45. 13, 14; Ezek. 16. 10; Ps. 132. 9.)

9. Blessed are they which are called. "Individually believers are guests; collectively they constitute the Bride. We ought, in imitation of Holy Scripture, to restrict the language drawn from marriage-love to the Bride, the Church as a whole; and not use it as individuals in our personal relation to Christ, as Rome does in the case of her nuns"—P. (Matt. 22. 2, 3; Luke 14. 15, 16.)

THE MISTAKE OF THE SEER.—10. I fell at his feet to worship him. "It seems, mistaking him for the Angel of the Covenant. But he saith, See thou do it not. In the original it is only, 'See not,' with a beautiful abruptness. To pray to or worship the highest creature is flat idolatry. I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus—I am now employed as your fellow-servant, to testify of the Lord Jesus, by the same Spirit which inspired the prophets of old"—WESLEY.

The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy—"is the result of the same spirit of prophecy in you, as in myself. We angels, and you apostles, alike bear testimony to Jesus by the operation of one and the same Spirit; wherefore we are fellow-servants, not I your lord to be worshipped by you"—P. (Ch. 22. 8; Acts 10. 26; 14. 14, 15; ch. 22. 9; 1 John 5. 10.)

Vers. 11-21. THE TRIUMPH OF CHRIST.—11. Behold a white horse, and He that sat upon him. "This is the point to which the preceding facts tend, and in which they have their completion. The seals, trumpets, vials, and all their accompanying warnings here unite. Faithful and true. (See ch. 3. 14; also 1. 5; 3. 7.) Faithful, in the fulfilment of His word; true, as of the substance of truth, being the 'Truth' itself (John 14. 6)"—W. W. (Isa. 11. 4.)

12. His eyes—identifying Him with the Son of Man in the first vision. (Ch. 1. 14.) Many crowns (R.V. "diadems")—that is, royal crowns. "For He is King of all nations. A name . . . which none knoweth—as God He is incomprehensible to every creature"—WESLEY.

13. Vesture dipped in blood (R.V. "sprinkled with"). "The reference to Isa. 63. 1, 3 is unquestionable. And so the primary meaning must be, as there, to describe the Conqueror as stained with the blood of His enemies. But no doubt it is legitimate for the Christian to remember, in interpreting both passages, that the way Christ overcomes His enemies is by shedding, not their blood, but His own"—C. B. (John 1. 1.)

14-16. The armies which were in heaven. "According to Old Testament usage (see 1 Kings 22. 19) this would mean the 'holy angels,' at least primarily. But some think the glorified saints are at least included; it seems in harmony with the ideas of this book to represent them, not indeed as executing Christ's vengeance, which the angels do (ch. 14. 19; Matt. 13. 39-42), but as spectators of His triumph, which is all that these armies seem to be"—C. B. On white horses. This denotes their conformity to Him, and their participation in His victory. On His vesture and on His thigh—"written partly on the vesture, partly on the thigh itself, at the part where, in an equestrian figure, the robe drops from the thigh"—P. King of kings. "Four names are ascribed to Him in this vision—(1) Faithful and True, representing Him as the Messenger and Mediator of gospel grace; (2) The name known only to Himself, indicating His Deity; (3) The Word of God, indicating His manifestation of God to man in His incarnation; (4) King of kings and Lord of lords, proclaiming the character in which He now appears, and is to be universally recognised; also a name peculiar to Deity. (See ch. 17. 14)"—W. W. (Matt. 28. 3; Isa. 11. 4; 2 Thess. 2. 8; Ps. 2. 9; Isa. 62. 3; Dan. 2. 47; 1 Tim. 6. 15.)

17, 18. To all the fowls. (See Ezek. 39. 17.) The supper of the great God (R.V. "The great supper of God"). Contrast this supper with "the marriage supper of the Lamb" (ver. 9). "This was a great feast which the vengeance of God would soon provide; a strongly figurative expression, denoting the vastness of the coming slaughter"—WESLEY.

19-21. The Beast and the kings. "Their confederacy under his leadership has been already intimated. (Ch. 16. 14, 16; 17. 12-14.) The so-called battle of Armageddon, there foretold, is here described"—C. B. The false prophet—"the same power which is designated as the second Beast with two horns. (Ch. 13. 11.) The overthrow of the Beast and the false prophet is described as distinct from the fall of Babylon and the judgment of the great harlot"—WESLEY.

"The first beast is a political power, the second is a spiritual power, the power of ideas; but both are beasts—the worldly anti-Christian wisdom serving the worldly anti-Christian power"—P. Cast into the lake of fire—into which the devil is cast. (Ch. 20. 10.) The rest were slain—"they are not, at least at once, consigned to the same eternal torment as their leaders"—C. B. "Here is a most magnificent description of the overthrow of the Beast and his adherents. It has, in particular, one exquisite beauty, that, after exhibiting the two opposite armies, and all the apparatus for a battle (vers. 11-19), then follows immediately (ver. 20) the account of the victory, without one word of an engagement or fighting. Here is the most exact propriety; for what struggle can there be between omnipotence and the power of all the creation united against it? Every description must have fallen short of this admirable silence"—WESLEY. (Dan. 7. 11; ch. 14. 10; 21. 8; 17. 16.)

CHAPTER XX.

VERS. 1-3. THE BINDING OF SATAN.—1. The bottomless pit. "The home or penal prison of the demons (see Luke 8. 31), where the word translated 'the deep' is the same. Note that it is nowhere identified with the lake of fire, the final destination of the devil and his angels"—C. B.

3. Shut it and sealed it over him (R.V.). "There is here no resumption of any part of the previous revelation, but a strict continuation from its last prediction. The emphatic reiteration of the words a thousand years seems intended to mark the period as literal and exact. The angel seizes Satan, binds, casts him into the abyss, locks him up, and sets a seal upon him, to the intent and with the effect that he should not deceive the nations any longer. The order in which the delusions of Satan will pass away is indicated in the connection of this passage with the preceding chapter. The Beast and the false prophet will be cast into the lake of fire, and all other open adversaries overcome (ch. 19. 21), and then shall Satan, 'the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience,' be imprisoned. The abolition of false religions must precede the moral regeneration of society"—W. W. "Our space will only allow us to indicate the view adopted, though with the greatest hesitation, in this (ELLICOTT's) Commentary—(1) The millennium vision is like so many of the apostolic visions, an ideal picture; it exhibits a state of things which is possible to mankind at any time; (2) But the rejection of Christ's power and victory postpones the realisation of this picture; (3) The vision has its approximate fulfilment, as the Church of Christ carries on her warfare against the prince of this world. To an Irenæus, a Polycarp, a Justin Martyr, a Tertullian, the picture of the world during the Christian centuries would have the aspect of a millennium. But we can see that this is only an approximate realisation. If the principles we have laid down are correct, the Church is justified in looking for the full realisation of the vision in a future age. Of the exact moment when this binding and imprisonment took place it is not needful to inquire too curiously. That which in the vision is described as the work of a moment may in the fact and fulfilment be a very gradual work. The same applies to the duration of the imprisonment; it is not to be understood literally any more than the other numbers in the book; it symbolises a lengthened period"—ELLICOTT.

Vers. 4–6. THE FIRST RESURRECTION.—4. Judgment was given unto them—"the right of judging (see 1 Cor. 6. 2, 3), which according to Dan. 7. 22 is given to 'the saints of the Most High'"—WESLEY.

5. They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. "If the literal resurrection of the bodies were meant, why are the souls of the persons raised exclusively mentioned? There is no reason for assigning to the word any other meaning than that it has in ch. 6. 9. Hence we infer that those who were faithful unto death shall live again in Christians of the same spirit, animated by similar principles. How often, and how naturally, are martyrs and confessors spoken of as enjoying a present triumph in the prevalence of those principles which they maintained and preserved by their Christian heroism, that is, in the existence of a generation which professes and practises them. Such a triumph will be justly called a 'reign' when the prevalence of their principles shall be universal, and the generation which shall exemplify them shall be all mankind"—W. W. "The thousand years mentioned in the passage do not express a definite period of time; the idea conveyed is simply that of completeness or perfection. Nothing is said of the saints of God in this picture of millennial bliss which does not find a parallel in what the seer has elsewhere written of their present life"—E. On the other side of the question it is right to present the following:—'This is the only prophecy where there is at all good reason for supposing that the millennium of popular belief is indicated, as distinct on the one hand from the kingdom of God which already exists in the Christian Church, and on the other from that which will be set up at the last day. We have, therefore, to consider the question, Is this prophecy to be understood literally? Is it meant that, for a period of a thousand years (or more), before the general resurrection and the end of this world, this earth will be the scene of a blessed visible kingdom of God, wherein the power of the devil will have vanished, and that of Christ be supreme and unopposed; wherein Christ shall either reign visibly on earth, or at least shall make His presence felt far more unmistakably than at present; while the martyrs and other great saints of all past time shall rise, and whether on earth or in heaven share in the glory of His reign. If the question be theologically open, it appears that, as a matter of opinion, the literal sense is to be preferred. Can any one honestly say that Satan has been bound during the time (already far more than a thousand years) that the kingdom of Christ on earth has already existed? that he deceives the nations no more till the present dispensation approaches its end in the days of Antichrist? It is far easier to hold that he will be bound for a long time (probably more than a thousand literal years) after Antichrist has been overthrown, but before the actual end of the world. This is the first resurrection. The plain meaning of these words is, that after the overthrow of Antichrist, the martyrs and other most excellent saints will rise from the dead, and have their part in the millennial kingdom; the rest of the dead, even those finally saved, will not rise till later. If the true sense be not the literal one, it is safest to regard it as being as yet undiscovered"—C. B. "The doctrine of the millennium was generally believed in the three first and purest ages of the Church; and this belief was one principal cause of the fortitude of the early Christians; they even coveted martyrdom, in hopes of being partakers of the privileges and glories of the martyrs in the first resurrection. Afterwards, for various reasons, the doctrine fell into disrepute, and lay depressed for many ages, but it sprang up again at the Reformation, and will flourish together with the study of the Revelation. We should neither, like some, interpret it into an allegory; nor with others, indulge an extravagant fancy, nor explain too curiously the manner and circumstances of this future state. It is safest and best faithfully to adhere to the words of Scripture, and to rest contented with the general account, till time shall accomplish and reveal all the particulars"—Bishop NEWTON.

Vers. 7–10. SATAN'S LAST STRUGGLE.—7. Satan shall be loosed—"as he deceived our first parents in paradise, he shall have the artifice (and the opportunity) to deceive the nations in this millennium kingdom, to show that no condition on earth is exempted or secured from sinning"—B.

8. The nations which are. "It almost seems as if the kingdom of Christ and of His saints had not been world-wide, but had been, like the Roman empire in S. John's day, or the Christendom of our own, a wide but limited region of light in the midst of a barbarous world. But it is possible that this prediction refers, not to an incursion from outlying heathens, but to an apostasy of outlying Christians. If so, this may be illustrated by the way that the remoter provinces of Christendom fell into heresy in the fifth and following centuries, and were, in great measure in consequence, absorbed in Islam afterwards. We may also think of the wild and unchristian sects rising in our own time in Russia and in the remoter parts of America, the countries of Christendom most distant from its centres of intellectual life"—C. B. Magog—"a race descended from a son of Japheth of that name. (Gen. 10. 2.) Gog—a dynastic name of the princes of that and kindred races. (Ezek. 38. 2; 39. 1–15.) These are used figuratively to describe a final assault of the enemies of truth on the kingdom of Christ"—W. W.

9. Compassed the camp . . . and the city—"the new Jerusalem, with the saints encamped around it, as the Israelites encamped around the tabernacle in the wilderness"—B. "These terms, borrowed from Israel's history, do not necessarily imply the gathering together of the Church into one locality"—W. W. (Heb. 12. 22.)

10. And shall be (R.V. "And they shall be")—all three of them. Day and night—"without intermission, such as now is caused by night succeeding day. For ever and ever—lit. 'unto the ages of the ages,' as strong an expression for absolute endlessness as biblical language affords"—C. B. (Ch. 14. 10, 11.)

Vers. 11–15. THE GENERAL JUDGMENT.—11. A great white throne—"great" to show the largeness and extent, "white" to show the justice and equity, of the judgment. Him that sat upon it—"the Son of God, to whom the Father hath committed all judgment; God in Christ, that is, the Father represented by the Son, is He before whose judgment-seat we must all stand. (See Acts 17. 31; Rom. 2. 16, compared with Matt. 16. 27; 25. 31)"—P. The earth and the heaven fled away. "The description is so plain that it does not need, so majestic and grand that it exceeds, commentary or paraphrase"—W. W. (2 Pet. 3. 7, 10, 11; ch. 21. 1; Dan. 2. 35.)

12. And I saw the dead, great and small—"of every age and condition. This includes, also, those who undergo a change equivalent to death. (1 Cor. 15. 51.) And the books. Human judges have their books written with pen and ink; how different is the nature of these books! Were opened. Oh how many hidden things will then come to light; and how many will have quite another appearance than they had before in the sight of men! With the book of God's omniscience, that of conscience will exactly tally. The book of natural law, as well as of revealed, will then also be displayed. It is not said, the books shall be read; the light of that day will make them visible to all. Then, particularly, shall every man know himself, and that with the last exactness. This will be the first true, full, impartial, universal history. And another book—wherein are enrolled all that are accepted through the Beloved; all who lived and died in the faith that worketh by love. Which is the Book of Life, was opened. What manner of expectation will then be, with regard to the issue of the whole!"—WESLEY.

According to their works. "We are justified by faith, but judged according to our works. For the general judgment is primarily designed for the final vindication of God's righteousness before the whole world. Faith is appreciable by God and the believer alone. But works are appreciable by all. These, then, are made the evidential test to decide men's eternal state"—P. (Dan. 7. 10; ch. 19. 5; Ps. 69. 28; Dan. 12. 1; Phil. 4. 3; ch. 3. 5; 13. 8; 21. 27; Jer. 17. 10; 32. 19; Matt. 16. 27; Rom. 2. 6; ch. 2. 23; 22. 12.)

13. Death and hell. "'Death' gave up the bodies of men, and 'Hades,' the receptacle of separate souls, gave them up, to be reunited to their bodies"—WESLEY.

"The essential identity of the dying and risen body is hereby shown, for the sea and the grave give up their dead. The body that sinned or served God shall, in righteous retribution, be the body also that shall suffer or be rewarded"—P. (Ch. 6. 8.)

14. Cast into the lake of fire. "Death and Hades are personified; they are cast into the lake of fire, to express the truth that Christ and His people shall never more die, or be in the state of disembodied spirits"—P. We are not told that they are tormented there, because they do not represent persons, as the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet do. This is the second death. R.V. adds, even the lake of fire. There is a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust (Acts 24. 15); of the latter, a resurrection unto condemnation (John 5. 29), resulting in everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord.

15. And whosoever. "Those who are not in the number of the saved by God's free grace are sure to have sins recorded against them, sufficient for a judgment 'out of the things written in the books,' to end in this terrible sentence"—C. B.

CHAPTER XXI.

VERS. 1–8. NEW HEAVENS AND EARTH.—1. A new heaven and a new earth. "There are two words translated 'new' in the English version. One relates to time, the other to quality. The latter word is used throughout this chapter. The newness described is the newness of freshness; the old decaying, enfeebling, and corrupting elements are swept away"—ELLICOTT. No more sea (R.V. "The sea is no more"). "Not a new sea, but no sea. The sea may be a type of mutability, or of commotion and conflict. Or to S. John, looking out on the waste of waters from his lonely isle, it may have presented the idea of isolation, separation, restriction, and barrier to intercourse. All this is to be done away in the new state of things"—W. W. (Isa. 65. 17; 66. 22; 2 Pet. 3. 13; ch. 20. 11.)

2. The holy city, new Jerusalem. "The new heaven, the new earth, and the new Jerusalem, are closely connected. This city is wholly new, belonging not to this world, not to the millennium, but to eternity. This appears from the magnificence of the description, and the opposition of this city to the second death. (Rev. 20. 11, 12; 21. 1, 2, 5)"—WESLEY. As a bride adorned for her husband—"beautiful with all perfection of wisdom and holiness, meek for the full fruition of the Lord Jesus Christ in glory"—M. H. (Isa. 52. 1; Gal. 4. 26; Heb. 11. 10; 12. 22; 13. 14; ch. 3. 12; Isa. 54. 5; 61. 10; 2 Cor. 11. 2.)

3. A voice out of heaven (R.V. "out of the throne"). "This voice from heaven, and the communications which follow (vers. 5–8), are in preparation for the vision about to be seen (ver. 9). The tabernacle. Undoubtedly an allusion to the tabernacle in the wilderness, as the most intelligent example and type of the localisation of the Divine presence. Will dwell with them. The force of the original word is to give the idea of 'sharing abode with,' as God had His tabernacle among the tabernacles of His people. (See Ezek. 37. 26, 27, which is almost identical with this passage. No material abode is meant)"—W. W. (Lev. 26. 11, 12; Ezek. 43. 7; 2 Cor. 6. 16; ch. 7. 15.)

4. And death shall be no more. "This is a full proof that this whole description belongs not to time, but to eternity. Neither shall sorrow, nor crying, nor pain, be any more; for the former things are gone away. Under the former heaven, and upon the former earth, there was death and sorrow, crying and pain; all which occasioned many tears; but now pain and sorrow are fled away, and the saints have everlasting life and joy"—WESLEY. (Isa. 25. 8; ch. 7. 17; 1 Cor. 15. 26, 54; ch. 20. 14; Isa. 35. 10; 61. 3; 65. 19.)

5. He that sat upon the throne. The speaker is the Lord Jesus Christ, as is clear from the titles He proceeds to give Himself. All things new — not merely recent, but changed from the old. (Isa. 43. 19; 2 Cor. 5. 17.)

6. It is done (R.V. "They are come to pass"). "All is as sure as if it had been actually fulfilled. When the consummation shall come, God shall rejoice over the work of His hands, as at the completion of the first creation God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good"—P. I will give to him that is athirst—Christ's promise, as recorded by S. John in John 4. 14; 7. 37. It is addressed to us in our present state, and is now to be realised. Here we drink of the stream, but we shall there drink of the fountain. The satisfaction of our spiritual desires and necessities here is the pledge of our attainment to the bliss promised. Freely—that is, gratuitously. (Ch. 1. 8; 16. 17; 22. 13; Isa. 12. 3; 55. 1.)

7. Shall inherit all things (R.V. "these things"). He shall be My son. "'He' is emphatical; implying the full realisation of the promise made in type to Solomon, son of David, and antitypically to the Divine Son of David"—P. (Zech. 8. 8; Heb. 8. 10.)

8. The fearful and unbelieving. "Fear stands here for moral cowardice, leading men to forsake the faith. (See 1 Tim. 1. 18, 19.) The cognate vices are linked together; fear with unbelief, murderers with fornicators, sorcerers with idolaters, those who practised magical arts being usually worshippers of demons. All liars. The adjective is significant and emphatic; liars of every kind, offenders against Divine truth, ordinary veracity, honesty. Falsehood is a characteristic of idolaters (Eph. 4. 25)"—W. W. The second death. (So ch. 20. 14.) "Everlasting destruction" (2 Thess. 1. 9). (1 Cor. 6. 9, 10; Gal. 5. 19–21; Eph. 5. 5; 1 Tim. 1. 9; Heb. 12. 14; ch. 22. 15; 20. 14, 15.)

Vers. 9–27. THE VISION OF THE NEW JERUSALEM.—9. There came unto me. "As in ch. 17. 1, 'unto me' should be omitted (see R.V.), so that the sentence as far as 'vials' is verbatim the same as there. The identical form of introduction emphasises the contrast between Babylon and Jerusalem, the harlot and the bride"—C. B. (Ch. 15. 1, 6, 7; 19. 7.)

10. In the Spirit. So the reader is reminded that the following verses describe a vision. A mountain—probably no definite signification is to be attached to this. The idea is perhaps due to the relative position of the Mount of Olives and Jerusalem. From that hill was a remarkable view over and into the city. (Mark 13. 3.) See also the similar vision in Ezek. 40. 2. In reference to the whole of this and of ch. 22, the following note should be carefully considered:—

"It is wise to recall once more that the descriptions are figurative, and are not to be understood literally. The following are the features which the description seems designed to enforce upon our thoughts. The great and holy community derives its glory from God. (Ch. 21. 11, 23; 22. 5.) Its blessings are not for a few, but open to all, for its gates lie open to all quarters. (Ch. 21. 12, 13.) The earthly and heavenly will be at one; angels, apostles, and patriarchs are there. (Ch. 21. 12, 14.) Diverse characters will find entrance there; the gates bear the names of the twelve tribes; yet the door of admission is alike for all. (Ch. 21. 21.) It will be the abode of all that is fair and good, and no disproportions will mar its loveliness. (Ch. 21. 17, 18.) The ancient truths, spoken by various lips, will be found to be eternal truths, full of varied and consistent beauty. (Ch. 21. 14, 19, 20.) The forms and helps which were needful here will not be needful there. (Ch. 21. 22, 23.) All that the servants of God have hungered and thirsted for here will be supplied there. (Ch. 22. 1, 2.) There will be blessings various, continuous, eternal; new fields of labour and forms of service will be opened there. (Ch. 22. 3, 4)"—ELLICOTT.

11. Having the glory of God—"not merely the Shekinah cloud, but God Himself as her glory dwelling in the midst of her. The promise to the earthly Jerusalem (Zech. 2. 5) is typical"—P. Her light—lit. "luminary"—probably the same as "the glory of God"; for He is the Light of the city (ver. 23); and He is described as being like unto a jasper. (Ch. 4. 3.)

12. Wall great and high—describing the exclusion of the ungodly, and the absolute security of the Church. Twelve angels—guardians and porters, still ministering unto the heirs of salvation. Names of the twelve tribes—implying that none but the spiritual Israel will be admitted there. (Ezek. 48. 31–34).

14. The wall on twelve foundations. "Probably each of the twelve sections into which the wall is divided by the gates rests upon an enormous jewel, reaching from gate to gate. This symbolises the solidity as well as the beauty of the Divine structure, and was itself symbolised by the enormous size of the stones used in the foundation of the earthly temple"—C. B. The names of the twelve apostles. As architects often have their names inscribed on their great works, so the names of the apostles shall be held in everlasting remembrance. Also, "figuratively showing that the inhabitants of the city had built only on that faith which the apostles once delivered to the saints"—WESLEY. (Matt. 16. 18; Gal. 2. 9; Eph. 2. 20.)

15–17. A golden reed. (See ch. 11. 1.) "It may possibly be intimated that the standard applicable to the Church, and all pertaining to it, on earth, will be also the measure and test of its perfections in the state of glory. Length and breadth and height are equal. The city shall be in the shape of a cube, the most perfect form; the impossibility of this, according to earthly things, shows that the whole is enigmatical, and suggests that we ought not to form gross and material conceptions of the city, but to deduce instruction from the emblem. It may imply the stability, proportion, and uniformity of heavenly things, and the incomprehensible glory of them. Twelve thousand furlongs. The furlong, or stadium, was a measure of distance, about two hundred and two English yards"—W. W. It is doubtful whether the twelve thousand furlongs be the measurement of one side of the square, or of the whole circumference. Even on the latter supposition, the city would be about three hundred and forty-four miles square. The truth is, the numbers are evidently typical, taken from twelve, the number of the apostles, multiplied by a thousand, and so the wall twelve multiplied by twelve. The wall is far beneath the height of the city, whence it has been suggested that the measurement represents the thickness of it. It is really unnecessary to endeavour to harmonise the details of this magnificent and instructive vision. (Ezek. 40. 3; Zech. 2. 1; ch. 11. 1.)

18. The city . . . pure gold, like pure glass (R.V.). "Ideal gold, transparent as no gold here is"—ALFORD. All apparently incompatible excellences will be combined.

19, 20. Garnished with . . . precious stones. "From the next sentence we understand that they are adorned by being constructed of these stones, not that stones are fastened on merely for ornament. See a parallel in Isa. 54. 11, 12, where, however, there is less detail than here, and what there is is not quite the same, a warning against expecting too minute a symbolism in the details. Jasper . . . sapphire, the Greek and Hebrew words are the same as the English. Yet it is almost certain that the stone so called in S. John's day was not our sapphire, but the far less precious lapis lazuli. Chalcedony, apparently not the stone now so called, but one closely resembling the emerald. Chrysolite . . . topaz. According to the best authorities the ancient application of these names was the reverse of the modern. 'Chrysolite' means 'golden stone,' while the modern chrysolite is green. Perhaps the ancient chrysolite included the modern jacinth as well as the true 'Oriental topaz.' Chrysoprasus—a variety of the beryl, of a more yellowish-green; probably that now called chrysolite. Jacinth, probably our sapphire. The modern jacinth is a crystalline stone, usually red. Amethyst, emerald, sardius, beryl, are undoubtedly the stones now so called"—C. B.

22. No temple therein. "There is no need of a temple where all are sensible of the universally pervading, universally visible, presence of God. Our Lord Jesus was Himself the Temple of God when on earth. (John 2. 21.) In His glorified body, presenting ever the remembrance of His sacrificial death, 'the Lamb as it had been slain,' He will be the Temple of God throughout eternity. In Christ the redeemed will have personal access to God, and intercourse with Him"—W. W. "Means of grace shall cease when the end of grace is come"—P. (John 4. 23.)

23. No need of the sun or of the moon. "The consolatory language of Isa. 60. 19, 20; Zech. 14. 6, 7, shall now receive its proper fulfilment. The happiness and spiritual comforts of the religious kingdom will not be like the lights of the sun and moon in the natural world, with intervals of light and darkness, but the perfect knowledge of God, the light of Christ's word, and the comforts of the Holy Spirit will be perpetual"—W. W. (Isa. 24. 23; ch. 22. 5.)

24. And the nations (R.V. omits of them that are saved). In the light—"amidst (R.V. or 'by the light'). The kings of the earth—who once had regard only to their own glory, having been converted, now in the New Jerusalem, bring their glory into it, to lay it down at the feet of their God and Lord"—P. (Isa. 60. 3, 5, 11; 66. 12.) "But probably this is only a part of the imagery; Jerusalem is conceived, as in Isaiah, as an imperial city receiving the tribute of the world, simply because that was the form of world-wide sovereignty recognised and understood in both prophets' times"—C. B.

25. Not be shut by day . . . no night. "Gates are usually shut by night; but in it shall be no night. There shall be continual free ingress into it, so that all that is blessed and glorious may continually be brought in"—P. Of course "no night" is the necessary result of the promise in ver. 23.

26. The glory and honour of the nations. "All that was truly glorious and excellent in the earth and its converted 'nations' shall be gathered into it; and whilst all shall form one Bride, there shall be various orders among the redeemed, analogous to the division of 'nations' on earth constituting one human family"—P. (Isa. 60. 11, 20; Zech. 14. 7; ch. 22. 5.)

27. Anything that defileth (R.V. "unclean")—"that is, 'unholy.' But those who are written in the Lamb's book of life—true, holy, persevering believers. This blessedness is enjoyed by those only; and, as such, they are registered among them who are to inherit eternal life"—WESLEY. (Isa. 35. 8; 52. 1; 60. 21; Joel 3. 17; Phil. 4. 3; ch. 3. 5; 13. 8; 20. 12.)

CHAPTER XXII.

Vers. 1-7. THE VISION—continued.—1. A pure river (R.V. omits pure, gives "bright" instead of clear, and removes in the midst of the street of it from ver. 2 to the end of this). "The prototype of this vision is that in Ezek. 47. 1-12, in which we find a river proceeding from the temple of God, its waters carrying life, unfading trees on either bank, and one kind of tree which 'shall bring forth new fruit according to his months,' and 'the leaf thereof shall be for medicine'"—W. W. (Ezek. 47. 1; Zech. 14. 8.)

2. The tree of life. "Here is the paradise of God, mentioned ch. 2. 7. 'The tree.' Not one tree only, but many. Every month—that is, in inexpressible abundance. The variety likewise, as well as the abundance of the fruits of the Spirit, may be intimated thereby. Leaves for the healing of the nations—for the continuing their health, not the restoring it; for no sickness is there"—WESLEY.

"The harmonious unity of Scripture is here exhibited. The Fathers compared it to a ring, an unbroken circle, returning into itself. How striking it is that, as at the beginning we found Adam and his bride, having fallen by temptation, driven from the Tree of Life and from the pleasant waters of Eden, so at the close the Second Adam, the Lord from heaven, leads His Bride the Church into a better paradise, amidst better waters; the Tree of Life also is there"—P. (Ezek. 47. 12; Gen 2. 9.)

3. There shall be no more curse—"but pure life and blessing; every effect of the displeasure of God for sin being now totally removed. But the throne of God and the Lamb—that is, the glorious presence and reign of God. And His servants—the highest honour in the universe—shall worship Him—the noblest employment"—WESLEY.

His servants. "Note the singular pronoun, implying the unity of the persons named"—C. B. Note also that here and in ver. 1 two persons are named, but only one throne. (Zech. 14. 11; Ezek. 48. 35.)

4. And shall see His face—"which was not granted to Moses. They shall have the nearest access to, and thence the highest resemblance of, Him. This is the highest expression in the language of Scripture to denote the most perfect happiness of the heavenly state. (1 John 3. 2.) And His name shall be on their foreheads. Each of them shall be openly acknowledged as God's own property, and His glorious nature most visibly shine forth in them"—WESLEY. (Matt. 5. 8; 1 Cor. 13. 12; 1 John 3. 2; ch. 3. 12; 14. 1.)

5. They shall reign for ever—"said of all the inhabitants of the city; the servants of God (ver. 3) shall have royal dignity and glory"—W. W. (Ch. 21. 23, 25; Ps. 36. 9; 84. 11; Dan. 7. 27; Rom. 5. 17; 2 Tim. 2. 12; ch. 3. 21.)

6. Sayings are faithful and true—"thrice repeated (ch. 19. 9; 21. 5); for we are slow to believe that God is as good as He is"—P. God of the holy prophets (R.V. "The God of the spirits of the prophets"), see 1 Cor. 14. 32. "The expression is intended to claim for 'the words of the book of this prophecy' equal authority with those of the Old Testament prophets"—W. W. (Ch. 1. 1.)

7. I come quickly—"spoken in the name of Christ, though hardly by Him (see ch. 3. 11; and vers. 12, 20)"—C. B. The seer repeats his former error (vers. 8, 9).

8. I fell down to worship—"as at ch. 19. 10. Some suppose that S. John is here repeating his statement of what he did then, but it is far more natural to understand that he did the same again. The words I come quickly would even more naturally lead him to think that this angel was 'He that is to come,' than the words of that angel led him to think he was the God whose 'true sayings' he communicated"—C. B.

Vers. 10–21. THE FINAL WARNINGS.—10. Seal not—"equivalent to, 'Write and publish.' In opposition to the command given to Daniel. (Dan 12. 4, 9, and also in this book, ch. 10. 4.) The time is at hand. The fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy was distant, that of S. John's prophecy is near. The New Testament dispensation is the time of the end and fulfilment. The Revelation points, on the one hand, to Christ's coming as distant, for it shows the succession of the seven seals, trumpets, and vials; on the other hand, it proclaims, 'Behold, I come quickly.' For our proper attitude is one of continual and prayerful watching for His coming"—P. (Dan. 8. 26; 12. 4, 9; ch. 10. 4; 1. 3.)

11. He that is unjust. "As if He had said, 'The final judgment is at hand; after which the condition of all mankind will admit of no change for ever.' Unrighteous—unjustified. Filthy—unsanctified, unholy"—WESLEY. "He that is unrighteous, let him do unrighteousness still; and he that is filthy, let him be made filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him do righteousness still; and he that is holy, let him be made holy still (R.V.). Does it mean that the time is so short, that it is barely sufficient to allow of men reforming themselves, so as to be ready for their Lord, and that therefore the lesson is, Let those who would be ready for Him remember that now is the day of salvation? Or is it not rather the declaration of the ever terrible truth, that men are building up their destiny by the actions and habits of their lives. 'Sow an act, reap a habit; sow a habit, reap a character; sow a character, reap a destiny.' So slowly, but surely, may the power of being masters of our fate pass out of our hands"—ELLICOTT. "The solemn lesson of this verse is, Be converted now in the short time left, and before I come (vers. 7, 12), or else you must remain unconverted for ever; sin in the eternal world will be left to its own natural consequences; holiness in germ will there develop itself into perfect holiness, which is happiness"—P. (Ezek. 3. 27; Dan. 12. 10; 2 Tim. 3, 13.)

12. My reward is with Me. "The rewards which I assign both to the righteous and the wicked are given at My coming. According as his work—his whole inward and outward behaviour—shall be"—WESLEY. My reward—"said of Jehovah (Isa. 40. 10); here the speaker is Jesus"—W. W. (Isa. 40. 10; 62. 11; Rom. 2. 6; 14. 12; ch. 20. 12.)

13. The Alpha and the Omega With these Divine titles, assumed by the Lord Jesus, comp. ch. 1. 8, 17, and 21. 6. (Isa. 41. 4; 44. 6; 48. 12.)

14. Blessed are they that do His commandments (R.V. "that wash their robes"). "The change in the Greek is only one of a few letters, and there seems no doubt which way S. John, in fact, wrote it"—C. B. That they may have right—"through His gracious covenant—to the tree of life—to all the blessings signified by it"—WESLEY. (Dan. 12. 12; 1 John 3. 24; ver. 2; ch. 2. 7; 21. 27.)

15. For without are dogs (R.V. "the dogs, the sorcerers," etc.). "The word dogs is used Phil. 3. 2, to describe impudent pretenders; 2 Pet. 2. 22, for unholy, licentious professors; Ps. 22. 16, for persecutors"—W. W. Maketh a lie (margin, "doeth a lie")—a serious caution against the acted lie as well as the spoken one. (1 Cor. 6. 9, 10; Gal. 5. 19, 20, 21; Col. 3. 6; ch. 9. 20, 21; 21. 8; Phil. 3. 2.)

16. To testify unto you—that is, "to His servants." (See ch. 1. 1 and 22. 6.) In the churches (R.V. "For the churches"). I am the root and the offspring of David—appropriate titles when assuring this Church of "the sure mercies of David" secured to Israel first, and through Israel to the Gentiles. "Root" of David as being Jehovah; "the offspring" of David as man. The bright and morning star. "I am the Star out of Jacob (Num. 24. 17); like the bright morning star, who puts an end to the night of ignorance, sin, and sorrow, and ushers in an eternal day of light, purity, and joy"—WESLEY. (Ch. 1. 1; 5. 5; Num. 24. 17; Zech. 6. 12; 2 Pet. 1. 19; ch. 2. 28.)

17. And the Spirit (R.V. margin, "Both the Spirit"). "With which I inspire My servants. And the Bride—the Church, whom I have espoused; or the Spirit of adoption in the Bride, says, with earnest desire and expectation—Come, and accomplish all the words of this prophecy. And let him that heareth say, Come—let everyone echo the invitation; and let My people, in all ages, consider it their duty so to do. And let him that is athirst—that sincerely and earnestly desires the blessings of the gospel, whether the blessings of grace or those of glory—Come, and partake of those blessings. Let him apply to the Lord Jesus, in repentance and faith, and he shall not apply in vain. Let him take of the water of life—he may partake of spiritual and eternal blessings—freely—yea, as freely as he makes use of the most common refreshments, as freely as he drinks of the running stream"—B. "There is a descending climax. Let him that heareth effectually and savingly Christ's voice pray individually, as the Bride, the Church, does collectively, Come, Lord Jesus. Let him who, though not yet having actually heard unto salvation, and so not yet able to join in the prayer, 'Lord Jesus, come,' still thirsts for it, come to Christ. Whoever is even willing, though his desires do not yet amount to positive thirsting, let him take the water of life freely—that is, gratuitously"—P. (Ch. 21. 2, 9; Isa. 55. 1; John 7. 37; ch. 21. 6.)

18, 19. For I testify (R.V. omits for, and gives "tree of life," instead of book of life. (See Deut. 4. 2; 12. 32.) "The parallel of these passages proves that the curse denounced is on those who interpolate unauthorised doctrines in the prophecy, or who neglect essential ones, not on transcribers who might unadvisedly interpolate or omit something in the true text. The curse is clearly designed to guard the integrity of this book of the Revelation, not to close the New Testament canon. It is not even certain that this was the last written of the canonical books"—C. B. "As in the beginning of this book a blessing is promised to the devout and obedient student of it (ch. 1. 3), so now at its close a curse is denounced against those who add to or take from it"—P. (Deut. 4. 2; 12. 32; Prov. 30. 6; Ex. 32. 33; ch. 3. 5; Ps. 69. 28; ch. 13. 8; 21. 2.)

20. He that testifieth these things—"even all that is contained in this book—saith—for the encouragement of the Church in all her affliction—yea (so R.V.)—answering the call of the Spirit and the Bride—I come quickly—to destroy all her enemies, and to establish her in a state of perfect and everlasting happiness. The apostle expresses his earnest desire and hope of this, by answering Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!"—WESLEY. (R.V. omits even so.) "Christ's I come, and S. John's Amen ('Come') are almost coincident in time; so truly does the believer reflect the mind of his Lord"—P. (Ver. 12; John 21. 25; 2 Tim. 4. 8.)

21. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (R.V. "The grace of the Lord Jesus be with the saints"). Amen.
